E MOST

AND MIGHTY PRINCESSE ELIZABETH

BY THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND, Fraunce, and ireland Queene, defender of the faith: &c.

NDER hope of your highnes gratious and accustomed fauor, I haue presumed to present here vnto your Maiestie, Plutarkes lyues translated, as a booke fit to be protected by your highnes, and meete to be set forth in Englishe. For vyho is fitter to giue countenance to so many greatstates, than such an highe and mightie Princesse? vvho is fitter to revive the dead memorie of their fame, than she that beareth the lively image of their vertues? vvho is fitter to authorize a vvorke of so great learning and vvisedome, than she vvhome all do honor as the Muse of the world? Therefore I humbly beseech your Maiestie, to suffer the simplenes of my translation, to be couered under the amplenes of your highnes protection. For, most gracious Souereigne, though this booke be no booke for your Maiesties selfe, vyho are meeter to be the chiefe storie, than a student therein, and can better understand it in Greeke, than any man can make it Englishe: yet I hope the common forte of your subjects, shall not onely profit them selues hereby, but also be animated to the better seruice of your Maiestie. For amonge all the profane bookes, that are in reputacion at this day, there is none (your highnes best knowes) that teacheth so much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuocion to Princes, as these liues of Plutarke doe. Hovve many examples shall your subjects reade here, of seuerall persons, and vvhole armyes, of noble and base, of younge and olde, that both by sea & lande, at home and abroad, have strayned their vvits, not regarded their states, ventured their persons, cast avvay their liues, not onely for the honor and safetie, but also for the pleasure of their Princes?

Then yvell may the Readers thinke, if they have done this for heathen Kings,

The Epistle Dedicatorie.

vvhat should vve doe for Christian Princes? If they have done this for glorye, vvhat shoulde vve doe for religion? If they have done this vvithout hope of heaven, vvhat should vve doe that looke for immortalitie? And so adding the encouragement of these exsamples, to the forwardnes of their ovvne dispositions: vvhat service is there in vvarre, vvhat honor in peace, vvhich they vvill not be ready to doe, for their vvorthy Queene?

And therefore that your highnes may give grace to the booke, and the booke may doe his service to your Maiestie: I have translated it out of French, and doe here most humbly present the same vnto your highnes, beseeching your Maiestie vvith all humilitie, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardon the errours of your most humble and obedient subject and servaunt, vvho prayeth God long to multiplye all graces and blessings vpon your Maiestie. VVritten the sixteene day of Ianuary. 1579.

Your Maiesties most humble and obedient servaunt,

TO

To the Reader.

HE profit of stories, and the prayle of the Author, are sufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epistle to the Reader: So that I shall not neede to make many wordes thereof. And in deede if you will supply the defects of this translation, with your owne diligence and good vnderstanding: you shall not neede to trust him, you may proue your selues, that there is no prophane studye better then Plutarke. All other learning is private, fitter for Vniversities then cities, suller of contemplation than experience, more commedable in the students them selues, than profitable vnto others. Whereas stories are fit for every place, reache to all perfons, ferue for all tymes, teache the liuing, reniue the dead, so farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to see learning in noble mens liues, than to reade it in Philosophers writings. Nowe for the Author, I will not denye but loue may deceiue me, for I must needes loue him with whome I haue taken so much payne: but I beleue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitablest story of all Authors. For all other were sayne to take their matter, as the fortune of the contries whereof they wrote fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath chosen the speciall actes of the best persons, of the samosfest nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your solues. My onely purpose to desire you to excuse the faults of my translation, with your owne gentlenes, and with the opinion of my diligence and good entent. And so I wisheyou all the profit of the booke. Fare ye well. The four eand twenty day of Ianuary. 1579.

Amiot to the Readers.

He reading of bookes which bring but a vaine and unprofitable pleasure to the Reader is instly missished of wrise and grauemen. Againe the reading of fuch as doe but onely bring propit, and make the keauer to be insentional or or in the position of the reading by some pleas auntines in the same: doe seeme some what harshe to divers delicate witts, that can not take fame: doe seeme some vuhat harshe to divers delicate wites, that can not taong ry long apon them. But such bookes as yeeld pleasure and profit, and doe both I delight and teache, have all that aman can delire why they should be wniuerfally liked and allowved of all fortes of men according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight, Doth winne the price in enery poynt aright.

Exther of these yeeldhis effect the better, by reason the one runneth wwith the other, prositing the more bicause of the delight and deliting the more bicause of the prosit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to have pleasure and profit matched together, ow hich kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this weife arme in arme, hath more allow ance then any other kind of veriting or invention of man. In respect we hereof it may be reasonably auoved, that men are more beholding to such good vvits, as by their grave and vvise vvriting have deserved the name of Historiographers, then they are to any other kind of veriters: bicause an historie is an orderly register of notable things said, done, or happened in time past, to mainteyne the continual remembrance of them, and to serve for the instruction of them to come.

Andlike as memorie is as a storehouse of mens conceits and deuises, without the which the actions of the other two parts should be unperfect, and welneare unprofitable: So may it also be fayd, that an bistorie is the very treasury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, and the wwonderfull aduentures & straunge cases (wwhich the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserved from the death of forgetsulnes. Hereuppon it riseth, that Plato the vvise sayth, that the name of historie was given to this recording of matters, to stay the sleting of our memorie, which otherwise would be some lost, and retaine litle. And we may well perceive how greatly we be beholding unto it, if we doe no more but consider in how v horrible darkenes, and in how v beassly and pestilent a quamyre of ignorance we shoulabe plunged: if the remembrance of all the thinges that have bene done, and have happened before we were borne, were veterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will overpasse the excellencie and worthines of the thing it selfe, for a smuch as it is not onely of more antiquiste then any other kind of variting that ever was in the worlde, but also we as weed among men, before there we as any wee of letters at all bicause that men in those dates delinered in their lifetimes the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songes, which they caused their children to learne by hart, from hand to hand, as is to be seene yet in our dayes, by the xample of the barbarous people that inhabite the new vound landes in the VVest, who without any records of veritings, have had the knowledge of thinges past, welneare eight hundred yeares afore. Likewrife I leave to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, and durablest monument that men can leave of their doings in this woorld to confectate their names to immortality. For there is not her picture, nor image of marble, nor arche of triumph, nor piller, nor fumptuous sepuichre, that can match the durablenes of an eloquet history, furnished worth the properties wohich it ought to have. Again, I mind not to stand much upon thus that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwayes professet to speake truth & for that the proper groud therof is to treate of the greatest & highest things that are done in the wworld; insomuch that (to my seeming) the great prosit thereof is as Horace sayth, that it is commonly called the mother of trothe & uprightnes, which commendeth it fo greatly, as it nedeth not els where to feeke any authority e, or ornament of dignitie, but of her very selfe. For it is a certaine rule and instruction, which by examples past seacheth ws to judge of things present, & to foresee things to come: so as we may know ve what to like of, & what to follow, what to millike, and what to eschew it is a pi-Eture, which (as it were in a table) fetteth before our eyes the things worthy of remembrance that haue bene done in olde time by mighty nations, noble kings & Princes, wife governors, valliant Cabteines & persons renovemed for some notable quality representing unto us the maners of straugenations the lavves & customes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their consultations & enterpriles, the meanes that they have vsed to compasse the withall, of their demeaning of them selves withen they wwere comen to the highest, or throwven downe to the lowvest degree of state. So as it is not poslible for any case to rise either in peace or wwarre, in publike or private affaires, but that the person which shall have diligently red, well conceived, or throughly remembred histories, shall find matter an them wwhereat totake light, & counsell wwherby to resolue himselfe to take a part, or to gene addice unto others, how to choose in doutfull & daungerous cases that, which may be for their most proffit. and in time to find out to what point the matter will come if it be well handled and how to moderate him selfe in prosperitie, and how v to cheere up and beare him selfe in adversitie. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacy, and speede, than the bookes of morall Philosophie doe : forasmuch as examples are of more force to move and instruct, than are the arguments and proofes of rea-Con, or their precise precepts, bicause examples be the very formes of our deedes, & accompanied with all circumstances. VV here as reasons and demonstrations are generall, and tend to the proofe of things. and to the beating of them into understanding : and examples tende to the showing of them in pra-Etile and execution bicause they doe not only declare what is to be done, but also wworke a desire to do it, as well in respect of a certaine naturall inclination which all men have to follow examples. as also for the beauvitie of vertue, which is of such powver, that where soener she is seene, she maketh her felfe to be loued and liked. Againe, it doth things with greater weight and gravitie than the inventions & deuces of the Poets: bicaufe it helpeth not it felfe with any other thing than with the plaine truth woher as Poetry doth commonly inrich things by commending them aboue the starres and their deserving, bicause the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreover, it doth thinges with more grace and modestie than the civill lavves and ordinances doe : bicause it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, than to chastise or punish. And yet for all this, an historic also hath his maner of punishing the weicked by the reproch of everlasting infamie, where with it defaceth their remembrance which is a great meane to withdrawn them from vice, who other wife would be levedly and vvickedly disposed. Like vvise on the contrarie parte, the immortall praise and clorie vuherewith it rewardeth welldoers, is a very lively & sharpe fourre for men of noble corage and gentlemanlike nature, to cause them to aduenture upon all maner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high corage and vviledom, vvho for defire to continue the remembraunce of their name, by the sieve and certaine recorde of histories, have willingly yeelded their lives to the service of the common vveale, spent their goods, susteined infinite peines both of bodie and minde in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in stablishing of lavves and governments, and in the finding out of artes and sciences necessarie for the maintenance and ornament of mans life : for the faithfull registring vobereof, the thanke is due to histories. And although true vertue feeke no revvard of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her selfe with the conscience of her well doing: yet not with standing I am of opinion, that it is good and meete to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honor of their vertuous deedes, feeing that honor doth naturally accompanie vertue, as the shadow doth the bodie. For wie commonly see, not to feele the sparkes of desire of honor, is an infallible signe of a base, wile and cloynish nature : and that fuch as account it an unnecessarie, needelesse, or unseemely thing to be praised, are likewvife no doers of anythings wvorthy of praise, but are commonly men of faint corage, wwhose thoughtes extend no further than to their lives, vohereof also they have no further remembraunce, than is before their eyes. But if the counsell of olde men be to be greatlie esteemed, bicause they must needes have feenemuch by reason of their long life; and if they that have travelled long in Fraunge countries, and have had the managing of many affaires, and have gotten great experience of the doings of this woorld, are reputed for lage, and worthie to have the revnes of great governmentes put into their handes : how o greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, wwhich is able to furnishe us with mo examples in one day, than the wohole course of the longest life of any man is able to doe? Insomuch that they which exercise them selves in reading as they ought to doe, although they be but young, become fuch in respect of under standing of the affaires of this uvortains if they uvere old and

My name is skill, my Syre Experience hyght,

And memorie bred and brought me forth to lyght. Which thing was ment likewwife by the Philosopher that sayd that the hand is the instrument of skill. By reason wwhereof it comes to passe ((ay they) that such as speake of matters of government and state, but specially of matters of warre by the booke, speake but as booke knights, as the Frenche prouer be termeth them, after the manner of the Gracians, who call him a booke Pilot, which hath not the fure and certaine knowledge of the things that he speakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the understanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that consist in the deede doing, where the hand is to be set to the wworke: no more then the often hearing of men talke and reason of paynting or the disputing uppon colors, without taking of the pensill in hand, can stand a man in any stead at all to make him a good paynter. But on the contrary part many have proved wife men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Besides this they alleage further that in matters of wvarre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by meanes wwhereof the flights and policies that are to be learned out of bookes, will serue the turne no more than mynes that are blowven up. According whereunto Camby ses telleth his sonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Musicke the nevvest songs are commonly best liked of for once, bicause they were neuer heard afore: So in the warres, those policies that neuer were practised afore, are those that take best successe, ocommonly have the best effect, bis ause the enemies doe least doubt of them. Neverthelesse I am not he that will mainterne that a vvise governor of a common vveale, or a great Captaine can be made of such a person, as hath neuer travelled out of his study, and from his bookes: how beit that which Cicero wiriteth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captainegenerall and Lieuetenant of the Romanes, to make wwarre against kinge Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the wvarres, and yet afterwardhe bestowed so great diligence in the reading of histories, and in conferring uppon enery point with the olde Captaines and men of longe experience, whome he caried with him, that by the tyme of his comming into Asia, where he was in deede to put his matters in execution, he was found to be a very sufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: infomuch that by those wayes, cleane contrary to the common order of wwarre, he discomfitted two of the most puysfant and greatest Princes that were at that time in the East. For his understanding was so quicke, his care so vigilant, and his courage so greate, that he needed no longe trayning, nor grosse instruction by experience. And although I graunt there have beene diverse Governors and Captaynes, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by longe continewed experience) have done goodly and greate exployees: yet can it not be denyed me, but that if they had matched the giftes of nature with the knowledge of learning, and the reading of histories, they might have done much greater thinges, and they might have becomen much more perfect. For like as in every other cunning & skill-proherein a man intendeth to excell: so also to become a perfect & sufficient person to governe in peace and wwarre, there are three thinges of necessitie required, namely, nature, art, and practife. Three things Nature (in the case that we treate of) must furnishers with a good moother wit, with a bodie necessary for well disposed to indure all maner of travell, and with a good will to advance our selves: Art must or Captains. gene us indgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wife discourses that we have read and double read in good histories : and practife will get us readinesse, affurednesse, and the ease howe to put thinges in execucion. For though skill be the ruler of doing the deede, yet it is a vertue of the minde which teacheth a man the meane point, betweene the two faultie extremities of too much and too litle, vuherein the commendation of all doinges confifteth. And vuhofoeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely triall of experience, and had lever to learne it at his overne cost, than at an other mans : he may well be of the number of those that are touched by this auncient prouerbe, which fayth, Experience is the schoolemistresse of fooles: bicause mans life is so short, and experience proverbe. is hard and daungerous, specially in matters of warre, wherein (according to the faying of Tamachusthe Athenian Captaine) a man can not fault tovice, bicaufe the faultes are fogreat, that most commonly they bring wwith them the overthrows of the late, or the loffe of the lives of those that do them. Therefore we must not tary for this wit that is woon by experience, which costeth so deere. and is folong a comming, that a man is ofttimes dead in the feeking of it before he have attained it. fo. as he had neede of a seconde life to imploy it in, bicause of the overlate comming by it. But we must make speede by our diligent and continuall reading of histories both old and never that over may enior this happine (e which the Poet (peaketh of :

A happie wight is he that by mishappes Of others, doth beware of afterclappes.

By the way, as concerning those that say that paper will be are all things: if there be any that unwworthily take wpon them the name of historiographers, and deface the dignity of the story for hatred or fauor, by mingling any untrueth worth it: that is not the fault of the historie, but of the menthat are partiall, who abuse that name unvvorthily, to couer and cloke their owne passions withall, which thing shall never come to passe, if the writer of the storie have the properties that are nevel-(arily required in a storie veriter, as these: That he set aside all affection, be voyde of enuy, hatred, and flattery: that he be a man experienced in the affaires of the world, of good vtterance, and good indeement to discerne wwhat is to be sayd, and wwhat to be lest wnsayd; & wwhat wwould do more harme to have it declared, than do good to have it reproved or condemned: for a finish as his chiefe drift ought to be to serve the common weale, and that he is but as a register to set downe the judgements and desinitiue fentences of Gods Court, whereof some are genen according to the ordinarie course and capacitie of our weake naturall reason, and other some goe according to Gods infinite power and incomprehenfible vvifedom, aboue and against all discourse of mans understanding, who being unable to reach to the bottome of his judgements, and to finde out the first motions and groundes thereof, do impute the cause of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought else but a fained deuice of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of such brightnesse, and confounded at the gaging of so bottomlesse a deepe hovobeit nothing commeth to paffe nor is done voithout the leave of him that is the verie right and trueth it selfe, with whom nothing is past or to come, and who knoweth and understandeth the very originall causes of all necessitie. The consideration wwhereof teachethmen to humble them selues under his mightie hande by acknowledging that there is one first cause which ouerruleth nature, vuhereof it commeth that neither hardinesse is alvuaies happie, nor vuisedom alvuaies sure of good successe. These so notable commodities are every where accompanied with singular delight, which proceedeth chiefly of diversitie and novelty wherein our nature delighteth and is greatly desirous of: bicause we having an earnest inclination towards our best prosperity and advancement, it goeth on fill, feeking it in every thing wwhich it taketh to be goodly, or good in this wworld. But for a fruch as it findeth not wherewith to content it selfe under the cope of heaven, it is soone weary of the things that it had earnestly desired affore, & so goeth on waddring in the waskilfulnes of her likings wherof she neuer ceasseth to make a continual chaunging until she have fully satisfied her desires, by attaining to the last end, which is to be knit to her chiefe felicity, where is the full perfection of all goodlines and goodnes. This liking of varietie can not be better releeued, than by that wwhich is the finder out and the preserver of time, the father of all noveltie, and messenger of antiquitie. For if wve finde

a certaine singular pleasure, in hearkening to such as be returned from some long voyage, and doe report things which they have seene in strainge contries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of lines, differing from ours: and if we be sometime so ranished with delight and pleasure as the hearing of the talke of some wrise, discreete, and wrell spoken old man, from whose mouth there flow with a streame of speech sweeter than honnie, in rehearsing the adventures which he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath indured, and the perills that he hath ouerpassed, so as we perceive not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we be ranished with delight and wondring to behold the state of mankind, and the true successe of things, which antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the fetting up of Empires, the ouerthrown of Monarchies, the rifing and falling of Kingdoms, and all things elfe woorthic admiration, and the same linely set forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that so linely, as in the very reading of them we feele our mindes to be so touched by them, not as though the thinges were alreadie done and past, but as though they were even then presently in doing, and we finde our felues caried away with gladnesse and griefe through feare or hope, well neere as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas not with standing we be not in any paine or daunger, but only conceine in our mindes the aductities that other folkes have indured, our felues sitting fafe with our contentation and ease, according to these verses of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleasure for to sit at ease.

Vpon the land, and safely thence to see.

How other folkes are to sied on the seases,

That with the blushring windes surmoyled be.

Not that the sight of others miseries.

Doth any way the honest bart delight,

But for bicause it liketh well our eyes,

To see harmes free that on our selues might light,

Also it is seene that the reading of histories doth so holde and allure good voits, that divers times it not only makes h them to forget all other pleasures, but also serves h very sittely to turne avvay their griefes, and somtimes also to remedie their diseases. As for example, we find it written of Alphonsus King of Naples, that Prince so greatly renovumed in Chronicles for his vvisedom and goodnesse, that being fore sicke in the citie of Capua, when his Phistiens had spent all the cunning that they had to recover him his health, and he favo that nothing prevailed; he determined with him selfe to take no mo medicines, but for his recreacion caused the storie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deedes of Alexander the great, to be red before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke so wonderfull pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and ouercame the waywwardnes of his disease. Whereupon hauing soone recoursed his helth, he discharged his Phisitions with such words as these: Feast me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, sith they can no skill to helpe me to recover my helth: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could so good skill to helpe me to recour my helth. Nove if the reading and knowledge of histories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I say it is much more for great Princes and Kings, bicause they have to do with charges of greatest weight and difficultie, to be best stored with giftes and knowledge for the discharge of their dueties: seeing the ground of stories is, to treate of all maner of high matters of state, as warres, battells, cities, contries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it seemeth more sit for them, than for any other kinde of degrees of men: bicause they being bred and brought up tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons, (as meete is for so great states to have) they take not To great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoweth those to take which will learne the noble auncient languages, and the painfull doctrine comprehended in Philosophie. Againe, when they come to mans state, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, so as there remaineth no exercise of wort more convenient for the, than the reading of histories in their owne tunge, which without paine is able to teache them even with great pleasure and ease, what soever the painfull workes of the Philosophers concerning the government of common weales can shewe them, to make them skilful in the vvell ruling and governing of the people and contries that Godhath put vnder their subjection. But the vvorst is, that they euer (or for the most part) have such maner of persons about them as feeke nothing els but to please them by all the wayes they can, and there are very feere that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: wohere as on the contrary part, an history flattereth them not but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of fuch as were like them in creatnesse of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalereus (a manrenovomed as vell for his skill in the good government of a common vveale, as for his excellent knovvledge other vile counfelled Ptolomy, first king of AEgypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he should often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the government of kingdomes, bicaufe (laydhe) thou shalt finde many things there, which thy fernaunts and familiar friendes dare not tell thee. Moreover, this is another thinge, that suche great personages can not easily travell out of the bounds of their dominions to voe view fraunce contries as prinate persons doe: bicause the ielousse of their estate, and the revarde of their dignitie, requires that they should never be in place volvere another man might comained them. And often times for wwant of having seene the contries, and knowwen the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they have adventured upponattempts without good ground; to awayde the webseh, the instruction they may have by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause then onely this last, surely it ought to induce Frinces to the often and diligent reading of histories, voherein are veritten the heroicall deedes of wife and valiant men, specially of kings that have bene before them, the considering voltereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage : bicause the seedes of Princely vertues that are bred with them selues, doe then quicken them vp with an emulacion towards those that have bene or are equall in degree with them, as well in respect of noblenes of bloud, as of greatnes of state, so as they be loth to give place to any person, and much lesse can find in their harts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doinges . VV hereof innumerable examples might be alleaged, if the thing were not so welknowen of it self, that it were much more against reason to doubt of it, than needefull to proue it. Therefore a man may truely conclude, that an historie is the scholemistresse of Princes, at wwhose hand they may wwithout payne, in wway of pastyme, owwith singular pleasure learne the most part of the things that belonge to their office. Now according to the diversitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of veriting that it weth, it hath fondry names given unto it: But yet among the rest there are two chiefe kinds. The one wwhich setteth dow one mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an historie: the other wwhich declareth their natures, sayings, and maners, is properly named their lines. And although the ground of them both doe cloze very neare in one yet doth the one re feet more the things, and the other the perfons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceede from within: the one the euents, the other the confultacions: betweene the wwhich there is oftentimes great oddes, according to this aunswer of the Persian Stramnes, to such as maruelled how it came to passe, that his denises being so politike had so unhappy successe: It is (quod he) bicause my deuises are vibolly from my ovin invention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of fortune and the king. And surely amongs all those that ever have taken uppon them to wwrite the lives of famous men, the chiefe prerocative, by the judgement of such as are clearest sighted, is justly given to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Cheronea in the contry of Baotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they lyft to read them through, with all his life long enen to his old age, had to deale in affayres of the common weale, as he him felfe witneffeth in diners places, specially in the treatise which he intitled, Whether an olde man ought to meddle with the gouernment of a common weale or not: and who had the hap & honor to be schoolemafter to the Emprour Traian as is commonly believed, and as is expressely presended by a vertaine Epistle fer before the Latin translation of his matters of state, which (to fay the truth) feemeth in my hadement to be some what suspicious, bicause I find it not among his worker in Greeke, besides that it speakesh as though the booke overe dedicated to Traian, which thinge a manifestly desproued by the beginning of the booke, and by divers other reasons. acertaine singular pleasure, in hearkening to such as be returned from some long voyage, and doe report things which they have seene in straumge contries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of lines, differing from ours: and if we be sometime so ranished with delight and pleasure at the hearing of the talke of some wife, discreete, and well spoken old man, from whose mouth there flowweth a streame of speech sweeter than honnie, in rehearsing the adventures which he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath indured, and the perills that he hath overpassed, so as we perceive not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we be rauished with delight and wondring to behold the state of mankind, and the true successe of things, which ansiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the setting up of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the rifing and falling of Kingdoms, and all things elfe worthie admiration, and the same linely set forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that so lively, as in the very reading of them we feele our mindes to be so touched by them, not as though the thinges were alreadie done and past, but as though they were even then presently in doing, and we finde our selves carried away with gladnesse and griefe through feare or hope, well neere as though we were then at the doing of them whereas not withstanding we be not in any paine or daunger, but only conceine in our mindes the adversities that other folkes have indured, our selves sitting fafe with our contentation and ease, according to these verses of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleasure for to fit at ease Vpon the land, and safely thence to fee How other folkes are to fied on the seases, That with the blushring windes turmoyled be.
Not that the fight of others miseries Doth any way the honest hart delight,
But for bicause it liketh well our eyes,
To see harmes free that on our selues might light.

Also it is seene that the reading of histories doth so holde and allure good writs, that divers times it not only maketh them to forget all other pleasures, but also serveth very sittely to turne avvay their griefes, and somtimes also to remedie their discases. As for example, we find it written of Alphonfus King of Naples, that Prince so greatly renovumed in Chronicles for his vvisedom and goodnesse, that being fore sicke in the citie of Capua, when his Phistions had spent all the cunning that they had to recover him his health, and he fave that nothing prevailed he determined with him selfe to take no mo medicines, but for his recreacion caused the storie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deedes of Alexander the great, to be red before him: at the hearing wwhereof he tooke so wonderfull pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and ouercame the wvaywvaranes of his disease. Whereupon hauing soone recoursed his helth, he discharged his Phisitions with such words as these: Feast me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, fith they can no skill to helpe me to recour my helth: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could so good skill to helpe me to recover my helth. Now if the reading and knowledge of histories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I say it is much more for great Princes and Kings, bicause they have to do wvith charges of greatest weight and difficultie, to be best stored with giftes and knowledge for the discharge of their ducties: seeing the ground of stories u, to treate of all maner of high matters of state, as warres, battells, cities, contries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it seemeth more fit for them, than for any other kinde of degrees of men: bicause they being bred and brought up tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons, (as meete is for so great states to have) they take not To great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth those to take wwhich will learne the noble auncient languages, and the painfull doctrine comprehended in Philosophie. Againe, when they come to mans state, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, so as there remaineth no exercise of wort more convenient for the, than the reading of histories in their owne tunge, which without paine is able to teache them even with great pleasure and ease, whatsoever the painfull workes of the Philosophers concerning the gouernment of common weales can shew them, to make them skilful in the well ruling and governing of the people and contries that God hath put wnder their subjection. But the vvorst is, that they ever (or for the most part) have such maner of persons

about them as feeke nothing els but to pleafe them by all the wayes they can and there are very fees that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrary part, an history flattiveth them not but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of fuch as were like them in creatnesse of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalereus (a manrenovomed as well for his skill in the good gouernment of a common vveale, as for his excellent knovvledge other vvile) counfelled Prolomy, first king of AEgypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he should often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the government of kingdomes, bicaufe (faydhe) thou shalt finde many things there, which thy sernaunts and familiar friendes dare not tell thee. Moreover, this is another thinge, that suche great personages can not easily travell out of the bounds of their dominions, to goe view fraunge contries as prinate persons doe: bicause the islousie of their estate, and the regarde of their dignitie requires that they should never be in place where another man might comained them. And often times for wwant of having seene the contries, and knowven the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they have adventured upponattempts without good ground: to anoyde the withich, the instruction they may have by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and fittell remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause then onely this last, furely it ought to induce Frinces to the often and diligent reading of histories, voherein are varitten the heroitall deedes of wife and valiant men, specially of kings that have bene before them, the confidering vultereof may cause them to be descrous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage : bicause the seedes of Princely vertues that are bred with them selues, doe then quicken them vip worth an emulacion towwards those that have bene or are equall in degree wwith them, aswell in respect of noblenes of bloud, as of greatnes of state, so as they be loth to give place to any person, and much lesse can find in their harts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doinges . VV hereof innumerable examples might be alleaged, if the thing were not so welknowen of it self, that it were much more against reason to doubt of it, than needefull to proue it. Therefore a man may truely conclude, that an historie is the scholemistresse of Princes, at wwhose hand they may wwithout payne, in way of pallyme of wwith fingular pleasure learne the most part of the things that belonge to their office. Now vaccording to the diversitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of veriting that it weth, it hath fondry names given unto it: But yet among the rest there are two chiefe kinds. The one which setteth dow one mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an historie: the other wwhich declareth their natures, sayings, and maners, is properly named their lines. And although the ground of them both doe cloze very neare in one, yet doth the one re feet more the things, and the other the persons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceede from within: the one the euents, the other the confultacions: betweene the which there is oftentimes great oddes, according to this aunsover of the Persian Stramnes, to such as maruelled hove it came to passe that his deales being fo politike had fo unhappy successe: It is (quod he) breause my denifes are witholly from my owin invention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of fortune and the king. And surely amongs all those that ever have taken uppon them to wwrite the lives of famous men, the chiefe prerogetive by the judgement of fuch as are clearest sighted, is justly given to the Greeke Philosopher Plutarke, borne in the citic of Cheronea in the contry of Buotia, a noble man, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they lyst to read them through, with all his life tong enen to his old age, had to deale in affayres of the common weale, as he him felfe witneffeth in divers places, specially in the treatise which he intitled, Whether an olde man ought to meddle with the gouernment of a common weale or not: and who had the hap of honor to be schoolemafter rothe Emprour Traian, as is commonly believed, and as is expressely pretended by a certaine Epittle fet before the Latin translation of his matters of state, which (to fay the truth) feemeth in my indement to be somewhat suspicious, bicause I find it not among his workes in Greeke, besides that it speakesh as though the booke overe dedicated to Traian, wohich thinge a manifestly disproved by the beginning of the booke, and by divers other reasons. For other wife , I am sure you have put your selfe in hazard of great daungers, and me in perill of saunderous tonques. ", bicause Rome can not avvay vvith a vvicked Emperour, and the common voyce of the people is al-" wvaies wvont to cast the faultes of the schollers in the teeth of their schoolemaisters: as for example: " Seneca is railed upon by launderous tonges, for the faultes of his scholler Nero: the scapes of Quinti-" lians young schollers are imputed to Quintilian him selfe: and Socrates is blamed, for being too myld " to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you shall doe all things well enough, fo you keepe you as you are. If you first set your selfe in order, and then dispose all other things according to vertue, all things shall fall out according to your desire. I have set you downe the meanes in woriting, which you must ", observe for the well governing of your common weale, and have shewed you of how great force ", your behaulour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow those thinges, you have Plutarke 35 for the directer and guider of your life: if not, I protest unto you by this Epistle, that your falling into " daunger to the ouerthrown of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epillle writnessesh plainly that he was the schoolemaister of Traian, which thing seemeth to be auowved by this woriting of Suidas : Plutarke being borne in the citie of Charonea in Baotia, vvas in the time of the Emperour Traian, and somewhat affore. But Traian honored him with the dignitie of Consulship, and commaunded the officers and Magistrates that were throughout all the contrie of Illyria, that they should not do anything without his counsell and authoritie. So doth Suidas wwrite of him, And I am of opinion, that Traian being so vvise an Emperour, would never have done him so great honor, if he had not thought him felfe greatly beholding to him for some speciall cause. But the thing that maketh me most to beleue it true, is, that the same goodnesse and instice appeared to be naturally imprinted in most of Traians savings and doings, whereof the paterne and movuld (as a man might terme it) is cast and set dowwne in Plutarkes Moralls, so as men may perceive expressely, that the one could well skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wifely. For Dion writeth, that among other honors which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree unto Traian, they gave him the title of the Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth that even unto his time, when a new Emperour came to be received of the Senate, among the cries of good hanfell, and the wishes of good lucke that were made unto him, one was: happier be thou than Augustus, and better than Traian. Howe seuer the case stoode, it is very certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes unto him. But when he had lived a long time at Rome, and was come home againe to his owne house, he fell to viriting of this excellent worke of Lines, which he calleth Parallelon, as much to fay, as a cupling or matching together bicause he matcheth a Grecian with a Romane, setting downe their lives ech after other, and comparing them together, as he founde any likeneffe of nature, condicions, or aduentures between them, and examining what the one of them had better or worfer, greater or leffer than the other: which things he doth with fo goodly and grave discourse every where taken out of the deepelt of most hidden secrets of morall and natural Philosophie, with so sage precepts and frutefull instructions, with so effectual commendation of vertue, and detestation of vice, with so many goodly allegacions of other authors, with so many fit comparisons, & with so many high inwentions: that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treasorie of all rare and perfect learning, than by any other name. Also it is sayd, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of singular learning, and a voorthie of the auncient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar frendes (which fave him so earneftly given to his studie, that he forgate all other things) what author he had leverest to choose, if he vvere at that point that he must needes choose some one to holde him to alone, did aunsvere that he would choose Plutarke: bicause that if they were all put together, there was no one both so profitable, and so pleasaunt to read, as be. Sosius Senecio to vy hom he dedicateth his vvorke, vvas a Senator of Rome, as vvitneffeth Dion, who wviteth that the three persons whom Train most loued and honored, were Sosius, Parma, and Celsus, insomuch that he caused images of them to be set up. True it is that he vorote the lines of many other men, which the flittfulnes of time hath bereft ve of among which he himselfe maketh mention of the lines of Scipio Africanus, or Metellus Numidicus. And I have red a litle Epiftle of a sonne of his, whose name is not expressed, copied out of an olde copie in the Librarie of S. Marke hole thice, wherein he wariteth to a frende of hu, a register of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the supples of lines, he fetteth downer the lines of Scipio and Epaintnonds, and tafity the lines of Augustus Cafar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But having wied all the diligence that I could in ferching the chiefe Libraries of Venice, and Rome, I could never finathern out. Onely I drew out certaine diuersities of readinges, and many corrections by conferring the old veritten copies with the printed hookes which have floode me in great flead to the understanding of many hardplaces : and there are a great number of them various & have reflored by conjecture; by the judgement & helpe of fuch men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in humane learning. Yes for all this, there remaine some places vnamended, howober very ferve, bicaufe some lines overe wanting in the original copies. whereof (to my feeming) it was better for me to writnesse the want by marking it with some flarre: than to geffe at it with all adurature, or to adde anything to it. Now finally, if I have our shotmy felfein any thing, as it is verie easie to do in for hard and tong a worke, specially to a man of fo Small abilitie as I am : I befeeche the Readers to wouchfafe for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horace giveth me, where he fayth: A man may well be ouerfeene

. In workes that long and tedious bene.

Specially fith that of formany good men, or men of skill as have heretofore fet hand to the translatino of it, there wo as never yet any one found that went through with it in any language, at least wife that I have feene or heard of and that fuch as have enterprifed to translate it, specially into Latin, have enidently vvitneffed the hardneffe thereof, as they may eafely perceive wwhich lift to conferre their translations with mine. Neuerthelesse if itso fortune that men find not the speech of this translation Co flouving, as they have found some other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands: I befeech the readers to consider, that the office of a sit translater, consisteth not onely in the faithfull expressing of his authors meaning, but also in a certaine resembling and shadowing out of the forme of his siyle and the many of his peaking : wnleffe he will commit the errour of some painters, who having taken vpon them to draw a man lively, do paint him long wwhere he should be short and groffe wwhere he should be slender, and yet set out the resemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harsh or rude Coever my speech be, yet am I sure that my translation will be much easier to my contriemen, than the Greeke copie is, even to such as are best practifed in the Greeke tonge, by reason of Plutarkes peculiar maner of inditing, wwhich is rather sharpe, learned, and short, than plaine, polished, and easie. At the bardest, although I have not compassed my matters so happily as ye coulde have wished and desired: yet do I hope that your Lordships in reading it will hold the parties good will excused which bath taken such paines in doing of it to profit you. And if my labor be so happie, as to content you: God be praised for it, which hath ginen me the grace to finish it. .

GRECIANS AN MANES, COMPARED TOGETHER BY THAT

graue learned Philosopher and Historiographer, Plutarche of Chœronea.

IKE as historiographers describing the world (frende Sossius Senecio) Sossius Senedoe of purpose referre to the vttermost partes of their mappes the of Rome. farre distant regions whereof they be ignoraunt, with this note: these contries are by meanes of fandes and drowthes vnnauigable, rude, full of venimous beaftes, SCYTHIAN ife, and frofen feas. Euen fo may I (which in comparinge noble mens lives have already gone fo farre into antiquitie, as the true and certaine historie could lead me) of the rest, being thinges past all proofe or chalenge, very well say: that beyonde this time all is full of fuspicion and dout, being delinered vs by Poets and Tragedy makers, sometimes without trueth and likelihoode, and alwayes

B without certainty. Howbeit, having heretofore fet foorth the lines of Lycurgus (which established the lawes of the LACED & MONIANS) and of king Numa Pompilius: me thought I might go a litle further to the life of Romulus, sence I was come so nere him. But considering my selfe as the Poet AEschilus did: What champion may with such a man compare?

or wwho(thinke 1) shalbe against him fet? Who is fo bold? or wwho is he that dare defend his force, in such encounter met?

In the end I resoluted to match him which did set up the noble & samous city of ATHEMS, A with him which founded the glorious and inuincible city of Rome. Wherein I would wishe that the inuentions of Poets, and the traditions of fabulous antiquitie, would suffer them felues to be purged and reduced to the forme of a true and historicall reporte: but when they square too much from likelyhode, and can not be made credible, the readers will of curtesie take in good parte that, which I could with most probability wryte of such antiquities. Now Thefeward furely me thinkes, that Thefew in many thinges was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by stealth, and out of lawful matrimony: both were reputed to be borne of the seede

Both valiant wvere, as all the wworld doth known. Both loyned valiancy with gouernment. The one of them built Rome, and the other, by B gathering into one dispersed people, erected the citie of ATHENS: two of the most noble cities of the worlde. The one and the other were ramishers of women: and neither thone nor thother coulde an oyde the mischiese of quarrell and contention with their frendes, nor the reproch of staining them selues with the blood of their nearest kinsemen. Moreouer, they say that both the one and the other in the end did get the hate and ill will of their citizens: at the least if we will beleue that reporte of Thefew, which carieth greatest show of trueth. Thefew of his fathers fide, was descended of the right linage of Erictheus the great, and of the first inhabitants which occupied the contrie of ATTICA, the which fince were called Autothones, as much to fay, as borne of them selues. For there is no memorie, or other mention made, that Pelips, king of they came out of any other contry then that. And of his mothers side he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightiest king of all the contrie of PELOPONNES VS, not so much for his goodes and richesse, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many in number, he bestowed on the greatest Lordes of all the contrie: his sonnes also, which likewise were many, he dispersed into diverse cities and free townes, findinge meanes to make them gouernors and heades of the fame. Pitheus, grandfather to Theseus on the mothers side, was one of his sonnes, and sounded the litle city of Troezen, and was reputed to be one of the wifest men of his time. But the knowledge and wisedom, which onely caried estimacion at that time, consisted altogether in graue sentences, and morall sayinges. As those are which wanne the Poet Hesiodus such fame for his booke intituled, The workes and dayes: in the which is read euen at this prefent, this goodly sentence, which they father D vpon Pitheus.

Pitheus the of Puhem.

AEgeus the

Thou shalt performe, thy promise and thy pay: to hyredmen, and that wvithout delay.

And this doth Ariftotle the Philosopher himselfe tellifie: and the Poet Euripides also, calling Hippolytus the scholler of the holy Pitheus, doth sufficiently declare of what estimacion he was. But AEgeus desiring (as they say) to know how he might have children, went vnto the city of Delphes to the oracle of Apollo: where by Apolloes Nunne that notable prophecy was geuen him for an aunswer. The which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned against to Athens. And bicause the words of this prophecy were somewhat darke, & hard: he tooke his way by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnto Pitheus. The wordes of the pro- E phecy were thefe.

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace, plucke not the tappe, out of thy trusty toonne: Before thou do, returne vnto thy place, in Athens towone, from wwhence thy race doth roonne.

AEshrathe of Thefeue.

Patheus vnderstanding the meaning, perswaded him, or rather cunningly by some deuise deceiued him in fuch forte, that he made him to lye with his daughter called AEthra. AEgens after he had accompanied with her, knowing that the was Pitheus daughter with whom he had Ang Puneus, & the mother lyen, and douting that he had gotten her with child: left her a sword and a payer of shoes, the which he hidde vnder a great hollow stone, the hollownes wherof served just to receive those F things which he layed under it, and made no living creature privy to it but her alone, straightly charging her, that if the happened to haue a fonne, when he were come to mans state, & of

A strength to remove the stone, and to take those things from vnder it which he lest there a that the should then sende him vitto him by those tokens, as secretly as she could, that no body els might knowe of it. For he did greatly feare the children of one called Pallas, the which layers The Pallas. wayte and foyall by all the meanes they could to kill him, only of despight bicause he had no nanchildren, they being fiftie brethern, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed Pallat had from her. And AEthra within fewe moneths after was deliuered of a goodly sonne, the which fire some. from that time was called Thefeus: and as some say, so called, bicause of the tokens of knowledge VVby Thehis father had layed under the stone. Yet some others write, that it was afterwardes at ATHENS Some of when his father knewe him, and autowed him for his fonne. But in the meane time, during, his infancie & childehood, he was brought vp in the house of his gradfather Pitheus, vnder the go-B uernmet & teaching of one called Conidas, his schoolemaster: in honour of whom the ATHE- connidas uernmet occasing of the day and the day before the great feaste of The few, having The few hans to this daye doe facrifice a weather, the daye before the great feaste of The few, having The few hans to this daye doe facrifice a weather, the daye before the great feaste of The few, having The few hans to this daye doe facrifice a weather, the daye before the great feaste of The few having The few hans to this daye doe facrifice a weather, the daye before the great feaste of The few having The few hans to this day in the few hans to this day in the few hans to the few hand to the few hans to the few hans to the few hand to the few h

But bicause they were warlike and valliantmen, which did joyne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the worlde were skilfullest in fight hande to hande, and woulde keepe their grounde: as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses.

They vee no slynges in foughten fields to have, nor bended bowves : but swords and trenchant blades. For the worlde at that time brought forth men, which A in The few in The fire for strong nesse in their armes, for swyftnes of feete, and for a generall strength of the whole bodye, dyd farre passe the common force of others, and were neuer wearie for any labour or trauell they tooke in hande. But for all this, they neuer employed these giftes of nature to any honest or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanously to hurte and wronge others: as if all the fruite and profit of their extraordinary strength had consisted in crueliye, & violence only, and to be able to keepe others under and infubiection, and to force, destroye, and spoyle all that came to their handes. Thincking that the more parte of those which thincke it a

But after that by fortune he had flayne Iphitus with his owne handes, and that he was passed ouer the seas into the countrye of Lydia, where he serued Queene Omphale a long time, condemning him selfe vnto that voluntarie payne, for the murder he had committed. All the Realme of Lydia during his abode there, remained in great peace and fecuritie from such kynde of people. Howbeit in GRECE, and all thereabouts, these olde mischieses beganne againe to renue, grow- C ing hotter and violenter then before: bicause there was no man that punished them, nor that durft take vpon him to destroye them. By which occasion, the waye to goe from PELOPON-NESVS to ATHENS by lande was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto Theseus, what manner of theeues there were that laye in the waye, and the outrages and villanies they dyd to all trauellers and wayefaring men, fought the rather to perswade him thereby to take his voyage alonge the feas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glorie of Hercules noble dedes, had long before fecretly fett his hearte on fire, so that he made reckoning of

For then he dyd ${\bf D}$ manifestly open him selfe, that he felt the like passion in his hearte, which Themistocles long time afterwardes endured, when he fayed: that the victorie and triumphe of Miltiades would not lett him sleepe . For euen so , the wonderfull admiration which Thesew had of Hercules Defire of fame pricketh corage, made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble actes and doings, and in the daye time, pricked forwardes with emulation and enuie of his glorie, he determined with him felfe one daye to doe the like, and the rather, bicause they were neere kynsemen, being cosins removed by the mothers side . For AEthra was the daughter of Pitheus , and

Alemena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lysidices, the which was halfe sister Harvalus nere to Pitheus, bothe children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he should be vtterly shamed and disgraced, that Hercules trauelling through the worlde in that forte, dyd E feeke out those wicked theeues to rydde both sea & lande of them: & that he, farre otherwise, should flye occasion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he should meete on his waye. Moreouer, he was of opinion he should greately shame and dishonour him, whom fame and common bruite of people reported to be his father: if in thonning occasion to fight, he should conuey him felfe by sea, and should carie to his true father also a paire of shooes, (to make him knowen of him) and a sworde not yet bathed in bloude. Where he should rather seeke cause, by manifest token of his worthie deedes, to make knowen to the worlde, of what noble bloude he came, and from whence he was descended. With this determination, Thefew holdeth on his purposed iorney, with intent to hurte no man, yet to defende him felfe, & to be reuenged of those which woulde take vpon them to affault him. The F first therefore whom he slewe within the territories of the cittle of EPIDAVRVM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber vied for his ordinarie weapon to carie a clubbe, and

And like as this clubbe he spoyle of the lyon dyd witnessethe greatnes of the beast which Herenles had slayne: euen so wannes of Pepoyte or the foot day with the first clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers hands, riphetes, at Theleus went all about, shewing that this clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne handes inuincible. This Sinnis had a goodly fayer daughter called Perigouna, which fled awaye, Pericouna when the fawe her father flayne: whom he followed and fought all about. Afterwardes Theseus maried Theseus be-C her vito one Desoness, the sonne of Euritus the Oechalian. After her he kylled Sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, bicause he robbed Sciron all trauellers by the waye, as the common reporte goeth: or as others faye, for that of a cruell, throw's downe wicked, and sauage pleasure, he put forth his feete to those that passed by the sea side, and the rocke by compelled them to washe them . And then when they thought to stowpe to doe it, he still Thefence fpurned them with his feete, till he thrust them hedlong into the fea: so Theseus threw him hedlong downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common reporte, and desirous (as Simonides sayeth) to ouerthrowe it that had continued by pre-fcription of time: dyd mainteine that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked perfone, but rather a pursuer and punisher of the wicked, and a friend and a kynseman of the most honest, and justest men of GRECE. For there is no man but will confesse, that Aacus was AEacus. the most vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychreus the SALA- Cychreus. MINIAN is honoured and reverenced as a god at ATHENS: and there is no man also but knoweth that Peleus and Telamon were men of fingular vertue. Nowe it is certeine, that this Sciron was the sonne in lawe of Cychreus, father in lawe of Aacus, and grandfather of Peleus and of Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the fayed F Sciron, and of his wife Charielo. Also it is not very likely, that so many good men would haue had affinitie with fo naughty and wicked a man: in taking of him, and geuing him

And going a litle further, he flewe Damastes, otherfew by wrest. wife surnamed Prograstes, in the cittle of HERMIONIA: and that by stretching on him out, to make him euen with the length and measure of his beddes, as he was wont to doe vnto straungers that passed by . Theseus dyd that after the imitation of Hercules, who punished tyrannes with the selfe same payne and torment, which they had made others sufrer, flame of fer. For euen so dyd Hercules sacrifice Busiris. So he stufled Antheus in wrestling. So B he put Cycnus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus heade, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, which continueth yet vnto this daye; for this Termerus dyd vie to put them to death in this forte whom he met: to iolle his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Theseus after this selfe manner, punishing the wicked cephifunari in like forte, justly compelling them tabyde the fame payne and torments, which they ner of Bassia. before had vniustly made others abyde. And so he helde on his iorney vntill he came to The Physicial the ruler of C EPH ISV s, where certaine persones of the house of the Physalides were men that feat the first which went to meete him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him fied Thefess according to the ceremonies vied at that time : and afterwardes having made a facrifice in their hour of propitiation vnto their goddes, they made him great chere in their houses: and this was C This facilities the first notable enterteinment he founde in all his iorney. It is supposed he arrived in the Planarche cal cittle of ATHENS, the eight daye of the moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius, He founde the comon wealth turmoyled with feditions, factions, and diuisions, and perticularly the house of AEgeus in very ill termes also, bicause that Medea (being banithed out of the cittie of C or Inthe) was come to dwell in Athens, and remained with Segem, whom she had promised by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children . But when the heard tell that Thefens was comen, before that the good king AEgeus (who was nowe becomen olde, suspitious, and affrayed of sedition, by reafon of the great factions within the cittie at that time) knewe what he was , the perfwaded him to poylon him at a feaste which they woulde make him as a straunger that D passed by . Thesew failed not to goe to this prepared seaste whereunto he was bydden, but yet thought it not good to disclose him selfe. And the rather to geue AEgeus occafion and meane to know him: when they brought the meate to the borde, he drowe out his fworde, as though he woulde have cut with all, and shewed it vnto him . AEgeus seeing it, knewe it straight, and forthwith ouerthrewe the cuppe with poylon which was prepared for him: and after he had inquired of him, and afked thinges, he embraced him as his fonne. Afterwardes in the common affembly of the inhabitants of the cittie, he declared, howe he anowed him for his sonne. Then all the people receyued him with exceeding ioye, for the renowne of his valiantnes and manhoode. And some save, that when AEgeus ouerthrewe the cuppe, the poyfon which was in it, fell in that place, where E there is at this present a certen compasse inclosed all about within the temple, which is called Delphinium. For even there in that place, in the olde time, stoode the house of MEgens: in witnes whereof, they call yet at this present time the image of Mercurye (which is on the fide of the temple looking towardes the rifing of the funne) the Mercurye gate of AEgeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before stoode allwayes in hope to recouer the realme of A THENS, at the least after AEgens death, bicause he had no children: when they fawe that Thefeus was knowen, and openly declared for his fonne and heire, and successour to the Realme, they were not able any lenger to beare it, see-The Pallon ing that not onely AEgens (who was but the adopted fonne of Pandson, and nothing at sides take a- all of the bloude royall of the Erictheides) had viurped the Kingdome ouer them, but F mes against that These also should enjoye it after his death. The other which were in Fauge Companie the Thefeur kilderstanding thereof, dyd breake and disparse them selves incontinently. And this is the leib the Pale cause (as some saye) why those of Pallena doe neuer make affinitie nor mariadge with lamides. those of A g N V S at this daye. And that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer speake these wordes which are cryed enery where els through our the whole B countrye of ATTICA, Acouste Leas, (which is as muche to faye, as, Hearken, O people) they doe so extreamely hate this worde Leos, for that it was the Herauldes name which wrought them that treason. This done, Theseus who woulde not line idelly at home and doe nothing, but defirous there withall to gratifie the people, went his waye to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which dyd great mischieues to the inhabitants The bull of of the countrye of TETRAPOLIS. And having taken him aline, brought him through Maraham of the country of The Range of the Inhabitants. Afterwardes he dyd facrifice by Thefem. him vnto Apollo Delphias. Nowe concerning Hecale, who was reported to haue lodged Apollo Delhim, and to have geven him good enterteinment, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the phisa. olde time, those townes and villages thereaboutes dyd assemble together, and made a C common sacrifice which they called Hecalession, in the honour of Iupiter Hecalian, where Iupiter Hethey honoured this olde woman, calling her by a diminutiue name, Hecalena: bicause calism. that when the receyued Thesew into her house, being then but very younge, the made muche of him, and called him by many prety made names, as olde folkes are wont to call younge children. And forasmuche as the had made a vowe to Jupiter to make him a folemne facrifice, if Theseus returned safe from the enterprise he went about, and that fhe dyed before his returne: in recompence of the good chere she had made him, the had that honour done vnto her by Thefeus commaundement, as Philachorus hathe writ-

Shortely after this exployte, there came certaine of King Minos ambaffadours out of CRETA, to aske tribute, being nowe the thirde time it was demaunded, which The Athe-D the ATHENIANS payed for this cause. The ATHENIANS perceyuing these fore troubles and plagues, ranne to the oracle of Apollo, who aunswered them that they shoulde appeare Minos: and when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrathe of the goddes woulde cease against them, and their troubles should have an ende . Whereupon the ATHENLAN s fent immediately vnto him, and intreated him for peace: which he graunted them, with condition that they should be bounde to sende him yerely into C R E T A, seuen younge boyes, and as many younge gyrles. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to satisfie an oldevowe of theirs which they had made of auncient time) sent somtimes the first borne of their children, vnto Apollo in the cittle of DELPHES: and that amongest them they also mingled those, which were defeended of the auncient prisoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But bicause they coulde not live there, they directed their iorney first into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of Pvglla, and afterwardes from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIEIANS. In memory whereof, the daughters of the Bottieians in a solemne sacrifice they make, doe vie to singe the soote of this C fonge: Lett vs to Athens goe. But thereby we may efee howe perilous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmitie with a cittie, which can speake well, and where learning and eloquence dothe florishe. For euer sence that time, Minos was allwayes blased and disgraced through out all the Theaters of ATHENS. The testimonic of Hesiodus, who calleth him the most worthie King, dothe nothing helpe him at all, nor the prayse of Homer, who nameth him Impiters famillier friende: bicause the tragicall Poets gott the vpper hande in disgracing him, notwithstanding all these. And vpon their stages where all the tragedies were played, they still gaue forth many ill fauored wordes, and fowle speaches of him: as against a man that had bene most cruell and vnnaturall . Yet most men thincke, that Minos was the King Radamathus. which established the lawes: and Radamanthus the judge and preserver of them, who cau- D fed the same also to be kept and observed . The time nowe being comen about for payment of the thirde tribute, when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet time of pay- maried, to genethem to be put forth to take their channe and lotte: the citizens of A THENS beganne to murmure against Ageus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this euill, was onely alone exempted from this griefe. And that to bring the gouernment of the Realme, to fall into the handes of a straunger his bastard: he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnnaturally compelled to leaue and forfake them. These just forrowes and complaintes of the fathers, whose children were taken from them, dyd pearce the harte of Thefens, who willing to yelde to reason, and The few effer. to ronne the selfe same fortune as the cittizens dyd: willingly offered him selfeto be sent thither, without regarde taking to his happe or adventure. For which, the cittizens greatly effeemed of his corage and honorable disposition, and dearely loued him for the good affection, he seemed to beare vnto the comunaltye. But AEgens hauing vsed many reasons and persivassions, to cause him to turne, and staye from his purpose, and perceying in the ende there was no remedye but he woulde goe: he then drue lottes for the children which should tons assets for the chil- goe with him. They reporte many other things also touching this matter, and specially of Ariadne: but there is no trothe nor certeintie in it. Other holde opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theseu: the one of them was OEnopion, & named OEnopion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongeft others the Poet Ion writteth it, who was borne in the Île of CHI 0, and speaking of his cittie, he sayeth thus: Thefeus Sonnes.

Nowewhat things are founde feemely in Poets fables, there is none but dothe in manner fynge them. But one Paenon borne in the cittle of A MATHVN TA, reciteth this cleane after another forte, and contrarie to all other: faying, that Thefeus by tempest was driven with the He of CYPRV s, having with him Ariadne, which was great with childe, and so fore sea sycke, Thefau les- that she was not able to abide it. In so muche as he was sorced to put her a lande, and him felfe afterwards returning abourde hoping to faue his shippe against the storme, was forthwith compelled to loofe into the sea. The women of the countrye dyd curteously receyue and intreate Ariadne: and to comforte her againe, (for she was marueilously oute of harte, to F A see she was thus for saken) they counterseated letters, as if Thesens had wrytten them to her. And when het groninge time was come, and she to be layed, they did their best by all possible meanes to faue her: but she dyed not with standing in labour, and could neuer be deliue- driadne red. So she was honorably buried by the Ladies of Cyprvs. Thefeus not long after returned dieb with thither againe, who tooke her death maruelous heauily, and left money with the inhabitantes of the countrie, to facrifice vnto her yearely : and for memorie of her, he caused two litle images to be molten, the one of copper, and the other of filuer, which he dedicated vnto her. This factifice is done the seconde day of September, on which they doe yet obserue this ceremonie: they doe lay ayoung childe vpon a bed, which pitiefully cryeth and lamenteth, The ceremoas women trauellinge with childe. They faye also, that the AMATHVSIANS doe yet call the mie of the fa-B groue where her tombe is sette vp, the woodde of Venus Adriadne. And yet there are of the Ariadne in NAXIANS, that reporte this otherwise: saying, therewere two Minoes, and two Adriadnees, Copius.

whereof the one was maried to Bacchus in the Ile of Naxos, of whome Staphylus was borne: and the other the youngest, was rauished and caried away by Theseus, who afterwardes for Two Minuse fooke her, and the came into the Ile of Naxos with her nurce, called Coreyna, whole grane and 180 Atooke ner, and the came into the feet of 190,000 white their doe sheweyet to this day. This seconde Adriadne dyed there also, but she had no such Corona honour done to her after her death, as to the first was geuen. For they celebrate the feaste Ariadnes of the first with all ioye and mirthe: where the sacrifices done in memorie of the seconde, marrebe mingled with mourninge and forowe. Howbeit there are some which will say, that these verses were made for the Heraelides, that is to fay, those that descended from Hercules; which flying for their safety and succour vnto the ATHENIANS, were entertained & much made of by them for a time. But the most parte holde opinion, they were made upon the occasion aforesaid. The vessell in which Theseus went and Thefeus went returned, was a galliot of thirtie owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the olde peeces of woodde that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer fince, in the difputations of the Philofophers, touching things that increase, to wit, whether they remaine alwayes one, or else they be made others: this galliot was alwayes brought in for an example of doubt. For fome mainteined, that it was still one vessell : others to the contrarie defended it was not so. And they C holde opinion also, that the feast of boughes which is celebrated at Athens at this time, was then first of all instituted by Theseus. It is sayed moreouer, that he did not carye all the wenches vpon whome the lotts did fall, but chose two fayer young boyes, whose faces were sweet and delicate as maydens be, that otherwife were hardie, and quicke sprighted. But he made them so oft bathe them selues in whotte bathes, and kepe them in from the heate of the sunne, and fo many times towashe, anointe, and rubbe them selues with oyles which serue to supple and smoothe their skinnes, to keepe freshe and fayer their colour, to make yellowe and bright their heares: and withall did teache them fo to counterfeate their speache, countenaunce and facion of young maydes, that they feemed to be like them, rather then young boyes. For there was no manner of difference to be perceived outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, D without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a procession, in which both he and the other young boyes, were apparelled then as they be nowe, which carie boughes on the day of the feast in their handes. They carie them in the honor of Bacehus and Ariadne, following the fable that is tolde of them 1 or rather bicause they returned home just, at the time and season, when they gather the fruite of those trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to fay, supper catyers, which are affiltantes to the facrifice done that day, in reprefenting the mothers of those, vpon whom the lottes did fall, bicause they in like sorte brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for so did their mothers tattle to their children, to comforte and encorage them. All these particularities were written by Demon the historiographer. There was moreouer a place chosen out to build him a teple in, B and he him felfe ordained, that those houses which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, thould now e yearely thenceforth become contributories towardes the charges of a folemme facrifice, which shoulde be done in the honor of him: and he did affigne the order thinks filling and administration of the same, vnto the house of the Phytalides, in recompence of the curtesse which they showed him when he arrived. Furthermore, after the death of his father AEgeus, he vndertooke a maruelous great enterprise. For he brought all the inhabitantes of the whole prouince of ATTICA, to be within the citie of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, which were before dispersed into diverse villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be affembled together, when occasion was offered to establish any order concerning the comon state. Many times also they were at variance together, & by the eares, making warres one vpon F presumants of an other. But Theseus tooke the paines to goe from village to village, and from family, to samilie, to let them understand the reasons why they should consent unto it. So he found the poore

A people and private men, ready to obey and followe his will: but the riche, and fuch as had authoritye in euery village, all against it. Neuertheles he wanne them, promising that it should be a common wealth, and not subject to the power of any sole prince, but rather a populer state. In which he woulde only reserve to him selfe the charge of the warres, and the preservation of the lawes: for the rest, he was content that every citizen in all and for all should beare a like fwave and authoritye. So there were fome that willingly graunted thereto. Other who had r.o liking thereof, yelded notwithstanding for feare of his displeasure and power which then was very great. So they thought it better to confent with good will, vnto that he required: then to rary his forcible compuliion. Then he caused all the places where justice was ministred, and all their halles of assembly to be ouerthrowen and pulled downe. He remoued straight alkindges B and officers, and built a town e house, and a counsaill hall, in the place where the cittie now stan- Atty, the deth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY, buthe called the whole corporation of them, A- towne house THENS. That done, he gave over his regall power Thefens refiaccording to his promise, and beganne to sett vp an estate or policye of a common wealth, greeth his beginning first with the service of the goddes. D Moreouer, bicause he woulde further yet augment his people, and enlarge his cittie, he entifed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the felfe fame freedome and priviledges, which the naturall borne citizens had. So that many judge, that these wordes which are in vie at this daye in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, Comeye hither: be the selfe same which Theseus then caused to be proclaymed, when he in that sorte dyd gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he suffered not the great multitude that came Theseus mes thither tagge and ragge, to be without diftinction of degrees & orders. For he first divided the keth diffire to noble men, from hul badmen and artificers, appointing the noblemen as judges & magistrates of states and to judge vpon matters of Religio, & touching the feruice of the godds: & of them also he dyd comon wealer chuse rulers, to beare ciuill office in the comon weale, to determine the lawe, and to tell all holy and divine things. By this meanes he made the noble men and the two other estates equall in voyce. And as the noblemen dyd passe the other in honour: euen so the artificers exceeded them in number, & the hulbandmen them in profit. Nowe that Thefeus was the first who of all others yelded to haue a common weale or populer estate (as Aristotle sayeth) and dyd geue Theseus the ouer his regall power: Homer self semeth to testifie it, in numbring the shippes which were in the first that game Græcians armie before the cittie of TROIA. Yet some will saye, that these games of Istimia were instituted in the honour & memorie of Sciron, & that Thefeus ordained them infatisfaction of his death: bicause he was his cosingermaine, being the sonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. For there are also that D write, that Queene Antiopa fent those fecretly which were hurte then into the cittle of CAL-CIDE, where some of them recoursed, & were healed: and others also dyed, which were buried neere to the place called AMAZONION. They saye that there died other of Auncient 10ninge an auncient tunine, cut intraction & forme of a rothing of the Amazones also, neere vinto the cittle of Charles and a which were buried all alongest the facion. And they blame him much also, for that he so lightly for sooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of AEgles the daughter of Panopeus, as we have recited before. Furthermore, Philochorus C writeth, that this was the first treatie that euer was made to recouer the dead bodyes slavne in battell: neuertheles we doe reade in the histories and gestes of Hercules, that he was the first that euer suffered his enemies to carye awaye their dead bodyes, after they had bene put to the fword. But who soener he was, at this daye in the village of ELEVTHERES, they doe showe the place where the people were buried, and where princes tumbes are seene about the cittie of ELEVSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimonie hereof, the tragedie AEschilus made of the ELEVSINIANS, where he causeth it to be spoken even thus to Theseus him felf, dothe clerely ouerthrowe the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendshippe be-The few val-twixt Firithous and him, it is fayed it beganne thus. The renowne of his valliancy was maruelously blowen abroade through all GRECE, & Pirithous desirous to know eit by experience, D thou friend. went euen of purpole to inuade his countrye, and brought awaye a certaine bootie of oxen of his taken out of the countrye of MARATHON. The few being aduertifed therof, armed straight, and went to the rescue. Pirithous hearing of his comming, fled notatall, burreturned backe sodainly to mete him. And so sone as they came to see one another, they both wondred at eche others beautie and corage, and so had they no defire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hande first to Theseus, sayed unto him. I make your selse judge of the damage you haue susteinned by my inuafion, and with all my harte I will make fuche fatisfaction, as it shall please you to assesse it at. The feus then dyd not only release him, of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were present-Pirithous & ly sworne brethren in the fielde: after which othe betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia,& E fent to praye Thefeus to come to his mariage, to visite his countrye, & to make merye with the Lapitha. He had bidden also the Centauri to the feast: who being druncke, committed many lewde partes, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithe chasticed them to well, that they flewe some of them presently in the place, & draue the rest afterwards out of all the countrye by the helpe of Thefeu, who armed him selfe, and fought on their side. Yet Herodotus wri-The Lepithe teth the matter somewhat contrarie, saying that Theseus went not at all vntill the warre was well begonne: and that it was the first time that he sawe Hercules,& spake with himneere vn-Thefew and to the cittle of Trachina, when he was then quiet, having ended all his farre voyages, & grea-Hercales mer test troubles. They reporte that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnes, and honorable entertainement betwene them, and howe great curtefic was offred to eache o-F ther. Neuertheles me thincks we should geue better credit to those writers that saye they mett many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and receyued into the brotherhed of

A themysteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenaunce and fautour which Thefeus showed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessitie of all his ill deedes and cruelties, before he could enter into the companie of those holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theseus was fiftie yeres olde when he tooke awaye Hellen Theseus fiftie and rauished her, which was very younge, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanieus sayeth. By screedle whe reasonwhereos, some seeking to hyde the rauishement of her as a haynous facte, doe reportest Hellen. was not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that caryed her awaye, who left her in his custodie and keeping: and that Thefeus would have kept her from them, and would not have delivered her to her brethern Castor and Pollux, which afterwardes dyd demaunde her againe of him. Others againe faye it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her him to keepe, for that he was af-B fraved of Enar shorus the sonne of Hippocoon, who would have had her away by force. But that which commeth nearest to the trothe in this case, and which in deede by many authors is testified, was in this force. D called Menestheus, the fonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the fonne of Orneus, & Orneus was the Thefins close fonne of Erictheus. This Menestheus was the first that beganne to flatter the people, & did seeke prifiner. to winne the fauour of the comunaltie, by sweete entifing words: by which deuise he stirred vp the chiefest of the cittie against Theseus (who in deedelong before begane to be wearie of him) by declaring vnto them howe Thefeus had taken from them their royalties & figniories, & had thut them vp in suche sorte within the walles of a cittie, that he might the better keepe them in fubiection & obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour forte of people, he dyd ftirre vp also to rebellion, persuading them that it was no other then a dreame of libertie which was promifed them: & howe contrariwife they were clearely disposses & throwen out of their own houses, of their teples, & from their naturall places where they were borne, to thend only, E that in liewe of many good & louing lordes which they were wont to have before, they should now be compelled to serue one onely hedde, & a strauinge lorde. Euen as Menestheus was very hotte about this practife, the warre of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly surthered his pretece. For these Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Castor & Pollux, came the Tyndarides downe with a great armie, against the citie of ATHENS: & some suspect fore that Menestheus der against was cause of their comming thither. Howbeit at the first entrie they dyd no hurte at all in the the Abbenian countrye, but only demaunded restitution of their sister. To whom the citizens made aunswer, that they knewe not where she was left: & then the brethern beganne to make spoyle, & offer warrein deede. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who having knowledge (I can not tell by what meane) that (he was secretly hidden in the cittle of Aphid Nes, reucaled it vnto them. F By reason whereof the Tyndarides did alwayes honour him very much, so long as he liued, & af-

Yet Dicearchus Sayeth, that in the armie of the Tyndarides therewere two Arcadians, Echedemus, A why so called. & Marathus, and howe of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which fithence hath bene called Academia: & after the name of the other, there was a village called Marathon, bicause he willingly offered him self to be sacrificed before the battell, asobeying the order & comandement of a prophecie. So they went & pitched their campe before the cittle of APHIDNES, & hauing wone the battell, & taken the cittle by affault, they raced the name or ra- place. They saye that Alyeus, the sonne of Seiron was slaine at this field, who was in the hoaste of the Tyndarides, & that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alyeus, in the which his bodye was buried. Howbeit Hereus writeth that Thefeus felf dyd kill him before Aphidnes: In witnes whereof he alledgeth certain verses which speake of Alyeus, VV hile as he sought with all his might and mayne (in thy defence fayer Hellen for to fight) In Aphidnes, upon the pleafaunt playne, bold Thefeus to cruell deathe him dight.

Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Thefeus being there, the cittie of Aphidnes, & his mother also were taken. But when it was wonne, they of AT HENS beganne to quake for feare, and Meneitheus counselled them to receyue the Tyndarides into the cittie, and to make them good chere, so they would make no warres but vpon Theseus, which was the first that had done them the wrog & injurie: & that to all otherels they should show fauour & good will. And so it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to doe as they lifted, they demaunded nothing els but that they might be receiued into their corporatio, & not to be reckoned for straungers, no more then Hercules was: the which was grafited the Tyndarides, & Aphidnus dyd adopt The Tynds them for his childre, as Pylius had adopted Hercules Moreouer they dyd honour them as if they had bene godds, calling them Anaces. Either bicause they ceased the warres, or for that they orhad bene godds, calling them Anaces. Either bicause they ceased the warres, or for that they or-and called A. dered them selves so well, that their whole armie being lodged within the cittie, there was not any hurte or displeasure done to any persone: but as it became those that have the charge of Cicer.de Nat. any thing, they did carefully watche to preserue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greke attentions word Anacos doth fignifie, wherof perchannee it comes that they call the kings Anactes. There are others also who holde opinion that they were called Anaces, bicause of their starres which appeared in the ayer. For the Attican tongue fayeth, Anacas, & Anecathen: where the comon people saye Anothen, that is to saye, aboue. Neuertheles AEthra, Theseu mother, was D caried prisoner to LACED & MON, & from thence to TROIA with Hellen, as some saye: & as Horegion to La. mer him self doth witnesse in his verses, where he speaketh of the women that followed Hellen.

AEthra the daughter deare of Pitheus aged Syre, and with her fayer Clymene she whose eyes most men desire.

Yetthere are other who aswell reject these two verses, & mainteine they are not Homers: as also they reproue all that is reported of Munychus. To wit, that Laodice being princly cocciued of him by Demophon, he was brought up secretly by AEthra within TROIA. But Hister the historien in his thirtenth of his histories of ATTICA, maketharecitallfarre cotrary to other, saying: that some hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was slayne in battell by Achilles 3& Patroclus in the countrye of Thess alle, neere to the river of Sperchius, & that his brother Hellor tooke the cit- E tie of TROEZEN, from whence he brought awaye AEthra: in which there is no manner of apparance or likelihodde. But AEdoneus king of the Molossians, feafting Hercules one daye as he passed through his realme, descended by chaunce into talke of Theseus of Pirithous, howe they came to steale away his daughter secretly: & after told how they were also punished. Hercules was marueilous force to understand that one of them was now dead, & the other in daungerto dye,& thought with him felf that to make his mone to AEdonew, it would not helpe the matter: he befought him only that he would deliuer Thefeus for his fake. And he graunted him. Thus Thefeus being delivered of this captivitie, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were polon by Her- not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: & at his returne he dyd dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the cittie had before caused to be built in his owne honour . And where first of ${\bf F}$ all they were called Thefea, he did now furname the all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Nowe when he was arrived at ATHENS, he would immediately have comaunded and ordered things as he was wont to doe; but he found him felf troubled much with fedition, bicause those who had hated him of long time, had added also to their old canckered hate, a difdain & contept to feare him any more. And the como people now were become so stubborn, mist diffaine that where before they would have done all that they were comanded, & have spoken nothing fem, to the contrarie: now they looked to be borne with, & flattered. Whereupon The few thought at the first to haue vsed force, but he was forced by the faction & contetion of his enemies to let all alone, & in the end, despairing he should ever bring his matters to passe to his desire, he secretly fent away his children into the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the sonne of Chalcodus. And him self, after he had made many withes & curses against the Athenians, in the village of Gargettus, in a place which for that cause to this daye is called Araterion: (that is to saye, the place B of curlings) hedid take the feas, & wet into the He of Scinos, where he had goods, & thought Thofun fled also to have founde friends. Lycomedes raigned at that time, & was king of the Ile, vnto whom from Aubens The seus made request for some lande, as inteding to dwell there: albeit some saye that he required him to give him ayde against the Athenias. Lycomedes, were it that he douted to entertaine fo great a personage, or that he dyd it to gratifie Menestheus: caried him vp to the high rocks, faining as though he would from thence have shewed him all his countrye round about . But when he had him there, he threw him downe hedlong from the toppe of the rocks to the bot- Thefeu tome, & put him thus vnfortunately to death. Yet other write, that he fell down of him felf by melly flame an vnfortunate chaunce, walking one daye after supper as he was wont to doe. There was no mã at that time that dyd followe or pursue his death, but Menestheus quietly remained king of Menestheus C ATHENS: and the children of Thefeus, as private fouldiers followed Elphenor in the warres of the of the short TROIA.But after the death of Menestheus, who died in the iorney to TROIE, Thefeus fonnes Thefeus returned vnto ATHENS, where they recoursed their state. Sithence there were many occasios former. which moued the Athenians to reuerence & honour him as a demy god. All which things were brought them. to Athens by Cimon in the admirall gallie. The Athenias received them with great ioye, with processions & goodly facrifices, as if Thefeus him self had bene a liue, & had returned into the cittie againe. Diners oninionsabout the name of

HE Historiographers doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor A for what cause, the great name of the cittie of Rome (the glorie wherof is blowen abroad through all the worlde) was first geuen vnto it. For fome thincke that the Pelafgians, after they had ouercome the greatest parte of the world, and had inhabited and fubdued many nations, in the ende dyd staye them selues in that place where it was newe buylded : and for their great strength and power in armes, they gaue the name of Rome vnto the cittie, as fignifying power in the Greeke tongue. Other laye, that after the taking and destruction of TROYA, there were certaine TROYANS which fauing them selves from the sworde, tooke suche veffells as they founde at aduenture in the hauen, and were by winds put with the THYSCANE shore, B where they anckred necre vnto the river of Tyber. There their wives being fo fore sea ficke, that possibly they could not any more endure the boisterous surges of the seasit happened one of them among the rest (the noblest and wifest of the companie) called Roma, to counsaill the other women of her copanions to fet their thippes a fire, which they dydaccordingly. Wherewith their hul bands at the first were maruelously offended. But afterwards, being compelled of necessitie to plant them selues neere vnto the cittie of PALLANTIVM, they were appealed when they fawe things prosper better then they hoped for, finding the foyle there fertile, and the people their neighbours civill and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore amongest other honours they dyd to requite this lady Roma, they called their cittie after her name, as from whom came the originall cause of the building and foundation thereof. They saye that from C ning of killing thence came this custome continuing yet to this daye at Rome, that the women faluting their kinsefolkes and hus bands doe kisse them in the mouthe, for so dyd these Troyan ladyes to mounte, came please their hulbands, and to winne them againe, after they had lost their fauours, and procufrom the Tro- red their displeasures with burning of their shippes. Other saye that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or els of Telephus the sonne of Hercules, and of the wife of AEneas; other faye of Ascanius, the sonne of MEneas, who named the cittie after her name. Other holde opinion that it was Romanus (the sonne of Vly ses and of Circe) that first founded Rome: other will faye that it was Romus the ionne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from TROYA. Other write that it was one Romis a tyranne of the LATINES, who draue the THVS CANS out of those

And furthermore, they who thincke that Romulus (as in deede it carieth Fables of Robest likelyhod) was he that gaue the name to the cittie, doe not agree about his auncesters. For mulas by the fome of them write, that he was the sonne of AEneas and of Dexitbea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into IT ALLE of a litle childe with his brother Remus; and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowen, all other shippes were cast awaye, saming the shippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good happe came to a staye woon a very plaine euen grounde on the bancke, and bicaule the children beyond all hope were faued by this meanes, therefore the place was afterwardes called Roma, Other faye that Roma the daughter of the first Troian ladye was maried vnto Latinus the sonne of Telemachus, by B whom the had Romulus. Other write, that it was AEmilia, the daughter of AEneas and of Lauinia, which was gotten with childe by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is fayed that there was sometime a king of A L B A named Tarchetun, a very wicked and cruell man, in whose house through the permission of the goddes appeared such a like vision: that there rose vp in the harthe of his chymney the forme & facion of amans prinie member, which continued there many dayes. And they saye, that at that time there was in THVSCANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king An oracle of Tarehetius suche an aunswer: that he should cause his daughteryet vnmaried to haue carnall Thuse me companie with the straunge thing, for the should be are a sonne, that should be famous for his valliancie, for strength of bodye, and his happie successe wherein he should exceede all men C of his time. Tarchetius tolde this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this straungething: but she disdaining to doe it, sent one of her waiting women to vndertake the entertainement . But Tarchetius was fo mad at this, that he caused them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddesse Vesta appeared to him in his sleepe in the night, and charged him he should not doe it. Whereupon he dyd commaund them to make him a pece of clothe in the prisone, with promise that they should be maried when they had finished it. These poore may des toyled at it all the line longe daye, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commaundement) that dyd vndoe all they had done the daye before. In the meane time, this waiting woman that was gott with childe by this straunge thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twynnes: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with D expresse commaundement he should cast them awaye. This Teratius caryed them vnto the bancke of the river: thither came a sheewoulfe and gave them sucke, and certaine byrdes that brought litle crommes and put them in their mouthes, yntill a fwyncheard perceyuing them, and wondring at the fight, dyd boldly goe to the children, and tooke them awaye with him. These infantes being thus preserved after they were come to mans state, dyd set vpon Tarchetius and slewe him . One Promathion an Italian writer, deliuereth this storie thus. But the reporte that carieth best credit of all, and is allowed of by many writers: commeth from Diocles Peparethian, (whome Fabius Pictor followeth in many thinges) who was the first that put forth this storie among the GRECIANS, and specially the chiefest poynts of it. Though this matter be somewhat diversely taken, yet in effect the storie is thus. The E right line and bloude of the kings of ALBA descended from AEneas, by succession from the seems fragfather to the sonne, and the Kingdome fell in the ende betweene two brethern, Numitor ment of Faand Amulius. They agreed by lotte to make disifion betweene them, whereof the one and of Cato. to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the golde, fyluer, readye money, goodes, and see all Haiuells brought from TROIA . Numitor by his lotte chose the Realme for his portion : A licensaffew, nuels brought from 1 KO1A. Promiter by its lotte choic the Realite for its portion: 67. Indian mulius having all the golde and treafure in his handes, dyd finde him felfe thereby the ftron. ger, and so dyd easely take his Realme from him. And fearing least his brothers daughter kines. might haue children which one day might thrust him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddeffe Vesta, there to passe her dayes in virginitie, & neuerto be maried: (some call her Rhea, other Syluia, and other Ilia) neuertheles not longe after the was founde with childe, against the Romaliu m F rule and profession of the Vestall Numes. So nothing had faued her from present death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Anulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithstanding she was straightly locked vp, that no body could see her, nor speake with her, least the should be brought a bedde without Anulius knowledge. In the ende she was deliuered of 4 two fayre boves and marueilous greattwynnes: which made Amulius more affrayed then before. So he commaunded one of his men to take the two children, and to throwe them awaye, and destroye them. Some saye that this servants name was Faustulus: other thincke it washe that brought them vp. But who focuer he was, he that had the charge to throwe them awaye, put thenrin a troughe, and went towards the river with intention to throwe them in. Howbeit he found it rifen so highe, and running so swiftely, that he durst not come neere the waters side. & so they being in the troughe, he layed them on the bancke. In the meane time the river swelling still, and overflowing the bancke, in such forte that it came under the troughe: dyd gently lifte vp the troughe, & caried it vnto a great playne, called at this present Cermanum, and in the

Acra Laurenna Fauflules wife. that merced she taynnes, The Greeke fareth Laren ther: & comaunded her in the morning the should goe into the market place, & salute the first manshe mer, & kepe him euer for her friend. Which thing she performed, & the first manshe met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeres, & one that had gathered together marueilous wealth & riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer maried. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, & loued her so dearely, that shortely after chassing to dye, he made her heire of all he had: whereof the disposed afterwards by her last will and testament, the best and greatest partevnto the people of Rome. Moreouer it is reported also, that she now being growen to be F famous & of great honour (as thought to be the leman of a god) dyd vanishe away sodainely in the self same place, where the first Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabru:

olde time Germanum (as I take it) bicause the Romaines called the brothers of father & mother, B

Germani. Nowe there was neere vnto this place a wilde figge tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romulus as the most parte thought: or els bicause the beasts feeding there were wont to come vnder the same in the extreame heate of the daye, and theredyd Ruminare, that is, chewe their cudde in the shadowe : or perhappes bicause that the two children dyd sucke the teate of the woulfe, which the auncient LATINE scall RVMA, and they at this day doe yet The goddeffe call the goddeffe on whom they crye out to geue their children sucke, RVMILIA. And in their factifices to her they vie no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with honye. To thefe two children lying there in this forte, they write, there came a the woulfe & gaue them fucke:

and a hitwaw also which dyd helpe to norithe and keepe them. These two beastes are thought to be cofecrated to the god Mars, & the LATINES doe fingularly honour & reuerence the hi- C twaw. This dyd much helpe to geue credit to the wordes of the mother, who affirmed the was conceyued of those two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some thincke she was deceyued inher opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce dyd rauishe her. Other holde opinion that the name of the nurce which gaue the two children fucke with her breaftes, gaue occasion to comon reporte to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINES doe call with one selfe name shee woulfes Lupas, & women that geue their bodyes to all comers: as this nurce the wife of Faustulus (that brought these children home to her house) dyd vie to doe. By her right name she was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES doe facrifice yet vnto this daye: and the prieft of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the sheading of wine and milke accustomed D at burialls, and the feast it felse is called Larentia. It is true that they honour also another Larentia, for like occasion. The clercke or fexten of Hercules temple, not knowing one daye howe to drive awaye the time as it should seeme: of a certaine livelines and boldnes, dyd desire Laring feat. the god Hercules to playe at dyce with him, with condition that if he dyd winne, Hercules should be bounde to send him some good fortune: and if it were his lucke to lose, then he promifed Hercules he would prouide him a very good supper, and would besides bring him a faver gentlewoman to lye with all. The conditions of the playe thus rehearfed, the fexten first cast the dyce for Hercules, and afterwards for him selfe. It fell out that Hercules wanne, and the fexten meaning good fayth, and thincking it very mete to performe the bargaine that him felfe had made, prepared a good supper, and hyered this Laurentia the courtifan, which was E very fayer, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus having feasted her within the tople. and prepared a bedde readyethere, after supper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules should have comen in dede & layen with her. And it is faid for trothe, that Hercules came this

A bicaufetheriner being ouerflowen, they were oftentimes compelled to paffe by bote to goe to the market place, and they called this manner of ferrying ouer, Velatura, Other fave, that those romblers & common players, which shewed fundrye games and pastimes to winne the fauour of the people, were wont to couer that passage ouer with canuas clothes and veyles, by which they goe from the market place to the lystes or shewe place where they ronne their horses, beginning their race cuen at the place: and they call a veyle in their tongue, Velum, This is the cause why the seconde Laurentia is honored at Rome, Faustulus, chief neateheard to Annalius, tooke vp the two children and no bodye knewe it, as some saye : or as other reporte, and likest to be true) with the prinitie & knowledge of Numitor, Amulius brother, who fecretly furnished them with money that brought vp the two young children. It is fayed also they were both con-B. neved vnto the cittle of the GABIAN's, where they were brought vp at schole, & taught all o- Romain and ther honest things, which they vieto teache the sonnes & childre of good & noble me. Further Remu, edu-they fave they were named Remus and Romulus, bigaule they were founde fucking on the teates of a woulfe. Nowe the beawtie of their bodyes dyd presently shewe, beholding onely but their stature and manner of their countenaunces, of what nature and linadge they were: and as they grewe in yeres, their manly corage increased marueloully, so as they became stowte and hardy men, in so much as they were neuer troubled or astonied at any daunger that was offered them.

Howbeit it appeared plainely that Romulus had more wit & understanding then his brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deale with their neighbours, either cocerning hunting, or the boundes and limites of their pastures; it was easely decerned in him, that he was C borne to commaund, and not to obeye. For this cause they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, and of those which were their inferiours. As for the kings heardmen, they passed not muche for them, saying that they were euen like them selues, and so seemed not to care a Pynne for their anger or displeasure, but wholy gaue them selues to all gentlemanly exercifes and trades, thincking to line idely & at ease without trauell, was neither comly nor conuenient: but to exercise and harden their bodyes with hunting, running, pursuing murderers and theeues, and to helpe those which were oppressed with wronge and violence, shoulde be credit and commendation to them. By reason whereof, in very shorte time they grewe to great fame and renowne, And it fell out by chaunce there rose some stryfe and variance betwene the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in so muche as those that were Numi-

D tors, caryed awaye by force some cattell of the others. Thother side would not be are that, but pursued fast after, and beating them well fauoredly, they made them take their legges, and brought backe againe the greatest parte of the cattell they had caried away with them. Wherat Numitor stormed marueilously, but yethis men seemed to make but litle accoumpt of it, and purposing reuenge, they gathered about them a good companie of vacabonds (that had neither home, nor resting place) and certaine fugitive bonde men which they intifed ill favoredly, incoraging them to steale awaye from their masters. Thus one daye whilest Romulus was busine Romulus a about some sacrifice, (being a deuoute man and religious, and well geuen to serue the goddes, goddy man. and to learne to diuine and tell before hande what things should happen and come to passe)it happened the heard men of Numitor to meete Remus very flenderly accompanied: for they fell E voon him sodainely, blowes were delt rowndely on bothesides, and men were hurte on either parte. Howbeit Numitors men in the ende proceed the stronger parte, and dyd take Remus by Remus taken force, and caryed him straight before Numitor, alledging many complaintes and matters a- of Numitor gainst him. Numitor durst not punish him of his owne authoritie, bicause he feared his brother Amulius, who was fomewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earnestly befought him to doe him iustice, and not to suffer him being his owne brother, to receyue such iniurye of his men. There was not a man in the cittle of ALBA, but dyd greatly millike the iniurie done to Numitor: and spake it openly, that he was no persone to be offered such a wronge. In so muche as Amulius moued herewith, dyd deliuer Remus into his handes, to punishe him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his house, he

F beganne to consider better of him, with admiration howe goodly a younge man he was, howe in height and strength of bodye he passed all the rest of his people; and perceyuing in his face an affured constancie, and bolde stedfast corage that yelded not, nor was abashed for any fwerableto that he fawe: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion by some secret inspiration of the goddes, which ordaine the depthe of great matters) beganne partely by conjecture, and partely by chaunce to take a conceit of him. So he as ked him what he was, & who was his father and mother: speaking to him in a more gentle wise, and with a friendlier countenaunce then before, to make him the bolder to answer, & be of better hope. Remus boldly aunswered him. Truely I will not hide the trothe from thee, for thou feemest to me more worthie to be

King, then thy brother Anulius . For thou enquiereft, and hearest first before thou condemneft: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill nowe, we thought we we, bicause my brother and I are two twynnes. But seeing we are nowe falsely accused vnto R thee, and by malicious furmifed tales are wrongefully brought in daunger of our lives: we intend to discouer our selues, and to declarestraunge things vnto thee, whereof the present perill we stande nowe in, shall plainely proue the trothe. Men saye that we have bene begotten miraculoufly, fostered and geuen sucke more straungely, and in our tender yeres were fedd by birdes and wilde beafts, to whom we were cast out as a praye. For a woulfe gaue vs sucke with her teates, and an hitwaw (they laye) brought vs litle cromes, and put them in our mouthes, as we laye voon the bancke by the river, where we were put in a troughe that at this daye remaineth whole, bounde about with plates of copper, vpon the which are some letters engraven halfe worne out, which peraduenture one daye will ferue for some tokens of knowledge (vn-comparing these wordes, with the age the younge man seemed to be of, and considering well his face: dyd not reject the hope of his imagination that smiled on him, but handled the mat-the was kept very straightly. Faustulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was prisoner, and of him felf & had bene the children of two of the Kings feruants, to wit of Faustulus and of Laurentia: I fave that the King had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor to doe inflice. went to praye Romulus to helpe him, and tolde him then whose children they were : for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darcke speaches, and glawnsingwise, and so muche as fufficed to put them in some hope . So Faustulus taking the troughe with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great haste, as marueilously affrayed for the present daunger he thought Remus in. The Kings fouldiers which warded at the gates of the cittie, beganne to gather fome D

fides, they espied his troughe which he caried under his cloke. Nowe amongest the warders, there was by chaunce one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be cast awaye, and was present when they were left on the bancke of the river to the mercie of fortune. This manknewe the troughe by & by as well by the facion, as by the letters grauen you it: who mistrusted straight that which was true in deede. So he dyd not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Faustulus with him to have him confesse the trothe. Faustulus being in this perplexitie, could not kepe all closeypon examination. but dyd ytter out somewhat of the matter, and yet he tolde not all . For he plainely justified the E children were aliue: vet he faved they were farre from the cittie of ALBA, where they kept beaftes in the fields. And as for the troughe, he was going to carye it to Ilia, bicaufe she had diuers times prayed him to let her see and feele it: to the ende the might be the more assured of her hope, who promised her that one daye she should see her children againe. So it chaunced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly dothe vnto those that are troubled, and doe any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to fend one prefently (who in all other things was a very honest man, but a great friende of his brother Numitors) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aliue. This persone being come to Numitors house. founde him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witnes thereof, and of the good happe discouered vnto Numitor: whereupon he perswaded him howe to set vpon his brother, and to F dispatchethe matter with spede. So from that time forwards, he tooke their parte. On thother side also the matter gaue them no leisure to deferre their enterprise, although they had bene

A willing: for the whole case was somewhat blowen abroade. So Romulus then got straight a power, and drewe very neere the cittie, and many of the citizens of ALBA went out to loyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Nowe Romulus power which he brought (ouer and besides those citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were divided by hundreds, and every hundred had his captaine who marched before his bande, carying litle bundells of graffe or of boughes tyed to the ende of their poles. The LATINES call these bundels Manipulos, whereof it commeth that yet at this daye in an armie of the Romaines, the fouldiers which are all under one enfigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus sturring up those that were Manipulares which are anyther one entire the cittle, and Romalus bringing in men from without, the tyranne Amulius fell in fuche called, feare and agonie, that without prouiding any thing for his fafety, they came vpon him sodain-Bly in his palace, and flewehim. Thus you hearehowe neere Fabius Pictor and Diocles Pepare-Amului thian doe agree in reciting the storie, who was the first in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the cittie of ROME: howbeit there are that thincke they are all but fables & tales deuised of pleasure. But me thincks for all that, they are not altogether to be reiected or discredited, if wewillconfider fortunes straunge effects vpon times, and of the greatnes also of the Romaine empire:which had neuer atchieued to her present possessed power & authoritie, if the goddes had not fro the beginning bene workers of the same, & if there had not also bene some strauge cause, and wonderfull soundation. Anulius being nowesslayne as before, & after that all things were appealed, and reduced to good order againe: Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the cittie of ALBA, being no lordes thereof, nor also would be lords of it, so long as their grandfa-C ther by the mothers fide was aliue. Wherefore after they had restored him to his estate, and had done the honour and duety they ought vnto their mother: they purposed to goe & build The building a cittle in those places where they had bene first brought vp, for this was the honestest culler of Rome. they could pretend for their departing from A LBA. Peraduenture they were enforced foto doe whether they wouldornot, for the great number of banished men, and fugitiue slaues which were gathered together by them for their strength, who had bene vtterly lost and cast away, if they had bene once discharged by them. Therfore it was of necessitie that they should dwell by them selues, separated in some place, to kepe this number together and in some order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the cittie of ALBA would not suffer such banished persones and runnagates to be mingled amongest them, nor would receaue them into their D cittie to be free among them. All which appeareth sufficiently: first, bicause they tooke awaye women by force: and so not of insolencie, but of necessitie, when they sounde no man that would bestow any of them. It is manifest also they dyd greately honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their cittie beganne a litle to be fetled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitiues and afflicted persones, which they called the Assessment reast temple of the god Assessment was fanctuarie and safety for all sortes of people that vie for all barepaired thither, and could get into the temple, for whom it was alledged they could not nifed perdeliuer any bonde man to his master, nordetter to his creditor, nor murtherer to the instice that fones and fuwas fled thither for fuccor, bicause the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expressely enioned them to graunte fanctuary to all those that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in E shorte space their cittle slorished, & was repleanished, where at the first foundation of it, they faye there was not aboue one thousand houses, as more at large hereafter shalbe declared. When they came nowe to the building of their cittle, Romulus & Remus the two brethern fell fodainely at a strife together about the place where the cittie should be builded . For Romulus Snife bearing built Rome, which is called four fquare, and would needes it should remaine in the place mondia and which he had chosen . Remus his brother chose another place very strong of situation, vpon Remus. mounte Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and nowe is called Rignarium. Remonium. Notwithstanding, in the ende they agreed between them selues this controuersie should be Rignarium; decided, by the flying of birds, which doe geue a happy diuination of things to come. So being fett in divers places by them selves to make observation, some saye that there appeared vnto

F Remus fixe, and to Romulus twelve vulters. Other faye that Remus truely fawe fixe, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he sawe twise as many: but when Remus came to him, then thereappeared twelue in deede vnto Romulus, and this is the cause why the Romaines at this

The Romains daye in their distinations and foothefayings of the flying of birds, doe marueloufly observe the A flying of the vulters. It is true which the historiographet Herodolus Ponticus writeth that Hercules reioyced much when there appeared a vulter to him, being readie to beginne any enterprise. For it is the soule of the worlde that dothe least hurte, and neuer marreth nor destroyeth any thing that man dothe fowe, plante, or fet: confidering that she feedeth on carion only, and dothe neuer hutte nor kill any liuing thing. Also she dothe not praye vpon dead sowle, for the likenes that is betwene them: where the eagles, the dukes and the fakers doe murther, kill, and eate those which are of their owne kynde. And yet as Æschylus sayeth, Needes must that forvle accompted be most vile, Most rauening, and full of filthie minde, Which doth him felf continually defile, by praying still upon his propre kinde.

Moreouer, other birdes are allwayes (as a man would faye) before our eyes, and doe daylie shewe them selues vnto vs: where the vulter is a very rare byrde, and hardely to be seene, and men doe not easely finde their ayeries. Which hathe genen some occasion to holde a false opinion, that the vulters are passagers, and come into these partes out of straunge countryes. The prognosticators also thincke, that such e things which are not ordinarie, and but seldome feene, be not naturall, but miraculously sent by the goddes to prognosticate something. When Remus knewe howe his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had cast a dytche, as it were for the wall about his cittie, Remus dyd not only scorneit, but hindered also his worke, and in the ende for a mockerie lept ouer his wall. To conclude, he C dyd fo much, that at the last he was slayne there by Romulus owne handes as some saye: or as they flewe Faustulus, and Plistinus also his brother, who had holpen himto bring vp Romulus. Howfoeuer the matter fell our, this Celer absented him felse from Rome, and went into the countrye of THVSCANE. And they faye, that men which are quicke, and readye vpon a socelate where daine, tooke their names euer after vpon him, and were called Celeres. As amongest other, for it alled. Quintus Metellus, after the death of his father, having in very fewe dayes made the people of Rame to see a combate of sensers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the sharpe, they surnamed him Celer, for that the Romaines marueiled howe he could prepare his things in so shorte a time . Furthermore, Romulus having nowe buried his brother, and his other two bringers vp D Romolius lay- (called foster fathers) in the place they call Remonia: beganne then to buyld and laye the whole compasse of their walle, which they call in Latine Pomerium, by shortning of the sylrhy sealled lables, for post murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they dyd take of the ploughe share, and drawe the ploughe, with leaving a certain space of earthe vnbroken vp : whereupon the Romaines thincke all the compasse of their walles holy and facred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and fanctified, they F would have had a conscience through them to have brought in, or caried out of the cittie, any things necessarie for the life of man, that had not bene pure and cleane. Nowe they beeshive fain. foundation of his cittie, sending for men out of Thyscans, who dydname and teache him particularly all the ceremonies he had to observe there, according to their lawes and ordinances as a great holy mysterie. And first of all they made a rounde dytche in the place called at this daye Comitium, into which they dyd cast their chiefest and best things, which men vselawfully for good, and naturally as most necessarie. After that they dyd throwe also into it, a litle of the earthe, from whence cuery man came, and mingled these all together. This dytche in their ceremonies is called the worlde, in Latine Mundus, euen the felfe fame name the Latines call the Vniuerfall. About this dytche they dyd trace the compasse of the cittie they woulde buylde, euen as one would drawe a circle about a center. This done, the E founder of the cittie taketh a plough, to which he fastened a culter or ploughe share of brasse, and so yoked in the ploughe an oxe and a cowe, he himselse holding the ploughe dyd make rounde about the compasse of the cittie a deepe surrowe. Those which followed him , had the charge to throwe the turnes of earthe inward into the cittie, which the ploughe share raised vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The surrowe thus cast vp was the twentie of Aprill: bicause the Romaines doe yet keepe that daye holy daye, and call it the The field of feaft of the nativitie of their countrye. On which daye they dyd not in olde time facrifice any of Rome feat thing that had life, as esteeming that daye (which was the nativitie of their cittie) to be most mete to be kept cleane and pure from being polluted or defiled with any bloude. Notwithstanding before Rome was buylded, they had another feast called the sheapeheards or heardmens holy daye, which they dyd celebrate vpon the fame daye, and called it Palilia. Nowe at The feet this daye the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMAINES is cleane contrarie to the Palita GRECIANS: yet for all this, they holde opinion for certaintie that the daye on which Romulus founded his cittie, was affuredly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada: that is to fave, the thirtie daye. On which there was seene an eclypse of the moone, which they suppose was ob- An eclopse of ferued by the Poet Antimachus (borne in the cittie of T to s)in the thirtenth yere of the fixt the moone at of the laying of Olympiade. Likewise in the time of Mareus Varro (as a man learned, and one that had redde as the simulation of the simula

Who being genen to the calculation of aftronomie for the Vario a phiphilotopher and matternation only, wherein he was thought most excellent: it dyd fall out that Varro Tamina a gaue him this question, to searche out what hower and daye the nativitie of Romulus was, mathematiwho gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they doe in the resolutions of certaine geometricall questions. For they saye, that by the selfe same science, one maye tell before of things The hower of to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainely the hower of his nativitie: a man natiand howe one maye tell also the hower of his nativitie, when by accidents they knowe what white maye be calculated by hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius dyd the question that Varro gaue him. And hauing his accidents. throughely considered the aduentures, dedes, and gestes of Romulus, howe long he liued, and howehe dyed: all which being gathered and conferred together, he dyd boldly judge for a certaintie, that he was conceyued in his mothers wombe, in the first yere of the seconde Olympiade, the three and twentie daye of the moneth which the Æ GYPTIAN scall Cheat, and now Romain napiade, the three and twentie daye of the moneth which the 25 of in which hower there was a lated by Tewhole eclypse of the sunne: And that he was borne into the worlde, the one and twenteth of rustus. the moneth of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the riling of the funne. For they will faye that a cittle hathe his reuolution and his time of continuaunce appointed, as well as the life of a man: and that they knewe by the fituation of the wombe. starres, the daye of her beginning and foundation. These things and suche other like, peraduenture will please the readers better, for their straungenes and curiositie, then offend or mislike them for their falsehood. Nowe after he had founded his cittie, he first and foremost dyd divide in two copanies, all those that were of age to carie armour. In every one of these companies there were three thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen: and they were called Legions, bicause they were forted of the chosen men that were pyckt out amongest all me the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which fignifieth the people. E After this, he made a hundred counsellers of the best and honestest men of the cittie, which he Remules in called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would finnesh a cafave, the counfell of the auncients. So they were called Patricians, as some will saye, the counWhat the faill of the fathers lawfull children, which fewe of the first inhabitants could shewe. It mave be, Partitions some will saye this name was geuen them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they & Senate had by the fanctuarie of their cittie, which worde they vie at this daye in the felfe fame fignification: as one that followed Enander into ITALIB, was called Patron, bicause he was pittefull, and relieued the poore and litle children, and so got him selfe a name for his pitie and humanitie. But methinckes it were more like the trothe to fave, that Romulus dyd call them fo, bi-cause he thought the chiefest men should have a fatherly care of the meaner sorte: conside-F ring also it was to teache the meaner force that they should not feare th'authoritie of the greater, nor enuie at their honours they had, but rather in all their causes should vie their fa-uour and good will, by taking them as their fathers . For even at this present, straungers call a marueilous great loue and good wil lamong them, making the one much beholding to theo-matters in hande. The clients againe enterchaungeably humbled them felues to their patrons, not onely in outwarde honour and reuerence towardes them, but otherwise dyd helpe them with money to marrie and aduaunce their daughters, or els to paye their dettes and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no lawe nor magistrate that could compell the patron to be a witnes against his client: nor yet the client to witnesse against his patron. So they increased, and continued, all other rights and offices of amitie and friendshippe together, sa-rewarde of the meaner and poorer. And thus of this matter we have fpoken furficietly. More-

Rompelies crafte about the ranishe-

should become very great and mightie, so as he rayled it by warres, and increased it by armes: and he fought out this culler to doe mischief, and to make warre vpon the Sabynes, To proue this true, some saye he caused certaine of their maydes by force to be taken awaye, but not past thirtie in number, as one that rather fought cause of warres, then dyd it for neede of mariages: which methinckes was not likely to be true, but rather I judge the contrarie. For feeing his cittie was incontinently repleanished with people of all sortes, whereof there were very fewe that had wives, and that they were men gathered out of all countryes, and the most parte of them poore and needye, so as their neighbours disdayned them much, and dyd not looke they would longe dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maydes and rauishing D them, to have an entrie into alliance with the SABYNES, and to entife them further to joyne with them in mariage, if they dyd gentely intreate these wives they had gotten, enterprised this violent taking of their maydes, and rauishing of them in suche a sorte. First he made it to be commonly bruited abroade in euery place, that he had founde the altar of a god hidden in the grounde, and he called the name of the god, Confus: either bicause he was a god of counfaill, wherupon the ROMAINES at this daye in their tongue call Confilium, which we call counauguer. Confue a god. fell: and the chief magistrates of their cittie Confules, as we saye counsellers. Other saye it was Regiune the the altar of the god Neptune, surnamed the patron of horses. For this altar is yet at this daye within the great liftes of the cittie, and euer couered and hidden, but when they vie the running games of their horse race. Other saye bicause counsell euer must be kept close and secret, E they had good reason to kepe the altar of this god Consus hidden in the grounde. Nowe other write when it was opened, Romulus made a facrifice of wonderfullioye, and afterwardes proclaymed it openly in divers places, that at suche a daye there should be common playes in Rome, and a solemne feast kept of the god Consus, where all that were disposed to come should be welcome Great numbers of people repaired thither from all partes. He him selfe was set in the chiefest seate of the showe place, apparelled faver in purple, and accompanied with the chiefe of his cittie about him. And there having purposed this rauishement you have heard of, he had geuen the figne before: that the fame should beginne, when he should rife vp and folde a playte of his gowne, and vnfolde the fame againe. Hereupon his men stoode attending The execution with their fwordes who so sone as they perceyned the signe was genen, with their swordes F drawen in hande, and with great showtes and cryes ranne violently on the maydes and daughters of the SABYNES to take them awaye and raufhe them, and fuffered the men to ronne awaye, without doing them any hurte or violence. So some saye, there were but thirtie rauls The member fhed, after whose names were called the thirtie linages of the people of Rome, Howbeit Va; of the Sabne lerius Antias writeth, that there were fine hundred and seuen and twentie; and Inha, fixe hun Red. dred foure fcore and three. In the which is fingularly to be noted for the commendation of Ros mulus, that he him felfe dyd take then but onely one of the maydes, named Herfilia: that after, Herfilia Rowardes was the only cause & mediation of peace betweet the SABYNES and the ROMAINES, mulusife. Which argueth plainely, that it was not to doe the SABYNES any hurte, nor to fatisfie any disordinate lust, that they had so forcibly vndertaken this rausshement: but to joyne two peoples together, with the straightest bondes that could be between men. This Hersilia as some fave, was maried vnto one Hostilius, the noblest man at that time amongest the R. O MAINES OF B as others write, vnto Romulus him felfe, which had two children by her . The first was a daugh?

ter, and her name was Prima, bicause the was the first: the other was a sonne, whom he named Remain fift Aullius, bicaufe of the multitude of people he had affembled together in his cittie, and afters led Prima wardes he was furnamed Abillim. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN writeth, wherein note His forme was withstanding there be divers that doecontrarie him . Among those which ravished then the daughters of the SABYNES, it is fayed there were founde certaine meane men carying away. a marueilous passing fayer one. These met by chaunce on the waye, certaine of the chief of the citrie, who would have taken her by force from them, which they had done, but that they beganneto crye they caried hervnto Talassius, who was a younge man marueilously well beloued of enery bodye. Which when the others understoode, they were exceeding glad, and C they commended them: in so much as there were some which sodainely turned backe at gaine, and dyd accompanie them for Talassius sake, crying out a lowde, and often on his name; From whence the custome came, which to this daye the ROMAINES fynge at their mariages, Talasius, like as the GRECIANS synge Hymeneus. For it is fayed he was compted very The cause happie that he met with this woman. But Sextius Sylla a CARTHAG INIAN borne, a man very why the Rowile, and well learned, tolde me once it was the crye and figne which Romulus gaue to his men; fines the to beginne the rauithement: whereupon those which carried them awaye, went crying this name of Ta-worde Talasius, and that from thence the custome hathe continued, that they singe it yet at lassius in matheir mariages. Neuertheles the most parte of authors, specially Inba, thinekes aris a warning to remember the newe maried women of their worke, which is to spinne, which the GR Er D CIANS call Talassa, the Italian words at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if Talassa. it betrue the ROMAINES vied this terme of Talafia, as we of GRECE doe vie we might by coniecture yeld another reason for it, which thould carie a better likelyhoode and proofe. For when the SABYNES after the battell had made peace with the ROMAINES, they put in an article infauour of the women in the treatie, that they should not be bounde to serue their husbands in any other worke, but in spinning of wolle. Euer fince this custome hathe growers, that those which genetheir daughters in mariage, and those who leade the bryde, and such as Marinnella are present at the wedding , speake in sporte to the news maried wife, laughing, Talastins : in ceremonic at token that they doe not leade the bryde for any other worke or feruice, but to fpinne wolle. Thereof this hathe benethe vieto this daye, that the bryde dothe not of her lefte come ouer

E the threshold of her husbands dore, but she is hoyled pretely into the house; bicause the Sz-BY NEWOMEN at that time were folift vp,&caried away by force. They faye also, that the manner of making the shed of the new wedded wives heare, with the Irô head of a laueling, came vp then likewife: this storie being a manifest token that these first mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the fwords poynte; as we have written more at large in the booke, wherein we render and showe the causes of the Romaines facions and customes. This rauilhement was put in execution about the eightenth daye of the moneth then called Sextilia, Similar and nowe named August: on which dayethey yet celebrate the feast they call Confaira. Nowe the SABYNES were good men of warre, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in willinger, and not within inclosed walles; being a thing fit for their noble courages that dyd would cause them to be asked in mariage of their parents, as bothe reason and lawe would require. To thend that with good will and consent of all parties, both peoples might contract amitie and alliance together. Whereunto Romulus made aunswer, he could not restore the maydes which his people had taken awaye and maried: but most friendly he prayed the SA-BYNES to be contented with their alliance. This aunswer being returned, and not liked, whilest the princes and communaltie of the SABYNES were occupied in confultation, and about Aconting of the arming of them selves: Acron king of the Ceninenses (a man exceeding couragious and skilfull in the warres, and one that from the beginning miltrufted the ouer bolde & flowte enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, conidering the late rauishment of the Sabynes B daughters, and howe he was alreadye greatly dreaded of his neighbours, and somwhat vntolerable, if he were not chafficed and brought lower) first beganne to inuade him with a puissant armie, and to make hotte and violent warres vpon him . Romalus on thother side prepared also, and went forth to meete him. When they were come so neere together that they might see one another, they sent defiance to eache other, & prayed that they two might fight man to man amiddest their armies, & neither of theirs to sturre a foote. Bothe of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his prayer vnto Iupiter, dyd promife, and made a vowe: that if he dyd geue him the victorie to ouercome, he would offer vp to him the armour of his enemie, which he dyd. For first he slew Acron in the field, & afterwards gaue battell to his men, & ouerthrew them also. Lastely he tooke his cittie, where he did no hurte nor yet displeasure to any, C fauing that he dyd commaude them to pull downe their houses, & destroy them, and to goe dwell with him at Rome: where they should have the selfe same rightes & priviledges which the first inhabitants did enjoye. There was nothing more enlarged the cittle of Rome, then this manner of pollicie, to ioyne allwayes vnto it those the had ouercome & vancquished. Romulus now to discharge his vowe, & in suche sorte that his offering might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleafaunt to his cittizens to beholde: did cut downe a goodly straight growen young oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lye. The fame he trimmed & dyd fet forth after the manner of victorie, hanging and tying all about it in fayer order, the armour and weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gowne to him, and putting vpon his long bushe of heare, a garland of lawrell, layed the young oke vpon his right shoulder, and D he first marched before towards his cittie, & songe a royall songe of victorie, all his armie following him in armes vnto the cittie in order of battell; where his cittizens receyued him in all paffing wife & triumphe. This noble & stately entriceuer fince hath genen them minds in such forte, & in statelier wife to make their triumphe. Theosfering of this triumphe was dedicated Impiter Fereof Michael riumphe a foote. After this ouerthrowe & taking of the CENINENSES, the inhabitants of the citties of Fidena, Crustumerium, & Antemna, rose alltogether against the Romaines, to Iupiter surnamed Feretrian: bicause the Latine worde Ferire, signifieth to hurt & kill: & the prayer Romulus had made, was, he might hurt & kill his enemie. Such spoyles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore fayeth Varro, that opes fignific riches. How beit me thinckes it were more likely to faye, that they were so named of this worde Opus, which betokeneth a dede, bicause he must needes be the chief of the armie, that hath slayne with his owne hands the generall of his enemies, & that must offer the spoyles called Spolia opima, as you would saye, his prin- E cipal spoyles & dedes. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captaines onely: of the obtained fire which Romulus was the first, who slew Acron, king of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Cossus was the second, who killed Tolumnius, the generall of the THV SCANS. Clodius Marcellus was the thirde, Trifes the . who flewe Britomartus, king of the GAVLES, with his owne hands. And for the two laft, coffus & Marcellus, they made their entrie into the cittie, carying their triumphes vpo charets triumphant: but Romalus dyd not so. Therefore in this poynt Dionysius the historiographer hath er-Falcing Parred, writing that Romulus dyd enter into Rome vpon a charret triuphant. For it was Tarquinius The cinics of Prise the sonne of Demaratus, who first dyd set out triumphes in so stately and magnificent The cinical of Thome. Other holde opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that euerentred ypon formerium, or triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in Rome, carying his F whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing the selues. So they fought a battell, in which they tooke the ouerthrowe: & left their citties to the spoyle of Romulus, their lands to be general where he thought good, and them selues to be caried to Rome. Romulau then dyd geue their lands among his cittizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maydens that they had taken away & rauilhed. For he was conteted that the fathers of them should kepe full their lads. By & by the other SABY NES stomaking thereat, did chuse them a general called

Taina, & fo went with a puysant army toward the cittie of Rome, whereunto to approache at The Salpane that time it was very harde, the castell or keepe of their cittie being seated, where at this day the lid by Ta-Capitoll standerh, within which there was a great garrison, whereof Tarpeius was captaine, & buffing the not his daughter Tarpeia, as some will saye, who set out Romulus as a soole. But Tarpeia the ca-B praines daughter, for the defire the had to have all the golde bracelets which they dyd weareabout their armes, folde the forte to the SABYNES, and asked for reward of her treason, all they Tampoid be-did weare on their left armes. Tatius promised them vnto her: & the opened them a gate in the mounts the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNES into the castell. Antigonus then was not alone, letteth in the who fayed, he loued those which did betraye, & hated the that had betrayed: noryet Cafar Au- Sabnes. guitus, who told Rymitalees the THRACIAN, that he loued treason, but he hated traytors. C For when he was gotten into the castell, he comanded the SABYNES (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to geue her all they weare on their left armes,& to doe as he did:who taking from his owne arme first, the bracelet which he ware, did cast it to her, and his target after. And so did all the rest in like sorte, in so much as being borne downe to the ground by the weight of bracelets & rargets, she dyed as pressed to deathe under were the reher burden. Neuertheles Tarpeins self was atteinted, & condenedalso of treason, by Romalus order, as Juba fayeth, it is fet forth by Sulpitius Galba. And the poet Simplus D also dothe dote most , who sayeth Tarpeia solde the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom the was in loue: as in these verses dothe appeare.

The SABYNES The Sabynes then scaping thus this daunger, beganne the battell. The fight dyd growe very cruell, and endured so a great while, the victorie leaning no more to the one side then to the other. There dyed in a small space a great number of men, amongest whom Hostilius was one, who as they saye was the husband of Hersilia, and grandfather to Hostilius that was king of Romai- C fla) ne. But for all his lowde crying, they left no flying Itill for life, and there was not one that durft returne againe. Whereupon Romalus lyfting vp his handes ffraight to heaven, dyd most feruently praye vnto tupiter, that it would please him D to staye the flying of his people, and not suffer the ROMAINES glotie thus to fall to their vtter destruction, but to repaire it by his fauour againe. He hadno sonerended this prayer. but divers of his men that fled, beganne to beathamed to flye before their King, and a fodaine boldnes came upon them, and their feare therewithall vanished awaye. The place they first stayed in was, where as nowe is the temple of Impiter Stator, which is as much to saye, as Impiter the stayer. Afterwardes gathering them selves together againe, they repulsed the Sa-BYNES even to the place they call nowe Regia, and vnto the temple of the goddeffe Vesta: where bothe the battels being prepared to geue a newe charge, there dyd fall out before A wonderfull them, a straunge and an vncredible thing to see, which stayed them they fought not. For of baldnes of wo- the SABYNE women whom the ROMAINES had ramified flome ranne of the one fide other. of the other fide of the battels, with lamentations, cryes, and showtes, stepping betweene their weapons, and among the flayne bodyes on the grounde, in suche forte that they feemed out of their wittes, and caried as it were with some spirites. In this manner they went to finde out their fathers and their husbands, some carying their fucking babes in their armes, other hauing their heare lose about their eyes, and all of them calling, now eypon the SABYNES, nowe vpon the Romaines, with the genteleft names that could be deuised: which dyd melt the hartes of bothe parties in suche forte, that they game backe a litle, and made them place Betweene bothe the battells. Then were the cryes and lamentations of euery one playnely hearde. There was not a manthere but it pittied him, aswell to see them in that pittiefull case, as to heare the lamentable wordes they spake : adding to their most humble petitions and requestes that could be any waye imagined, passing wife persuasions and reasons to induce them to a peace. So the cittie being augmented by the one halfe, they dyd choose of the Sabynes another hundred new Patricians, ynto the first hundred of the Ko-MAINES that were chosen before. Then were the Legions made of fixe thousand footemen, & The Romaine fix hundred horsemen. After they divided their inhabitats into three Tribes, wherof those that legion, 6000. came of Romulus, were called Ramnenses after his name: those that came of Tatius were called footners, Tatienses after his name; and those that were of the third stocke, were called Lucerenses, as from The Romaine the Latine word Lucus, called with vs a groue in English, bicause thither great number of people of all fortes dyd gather, which afterwards were made citizens of Rome. The very worde of

For hereupon the ROMAINES call those at this daye, their Tribunes, which are the chiefe heades of the people. The staffe whereof was of a cornell tree: & the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground being a lustye fatte soyle, that no man could pul it out, although many proued it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did so nourishe the ende of this staffe, that it tooke roote, and beganne to spread braunches : so that in time it became a fayer great cornell tree, which the fucceffours of Romulus dyd inclose with a walle, & dyd kepe and worthippe it as a very holy B thing. If by chaunce any went to fee it, and found it looked not freshe and grene, but like a tree withered and dryed awaye for lacke of moysture: he went awaye straight as one affrayed, crying to all he met (& they with him went crying still) in euery place, water, water, as it had bene to haue quenched a fyre. Then ranne they thither out of all quarters with veffels of water, to water and moystethe tree. In the time of Caius Casar, who caused the stayers about it to be re-

Other faye the was the wife of Enander the Arcadian, who being a prophetesse inspired by the god Phabus, gaue the oracles in verse, wherupo she was surnamed Carmenta, bicause that Carmina in Latine fignifie verses: for it is of certaintie that her proper D name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which geue another manner of derivation and interpretation of this worde Carmenta, which is the liklier to be true: as if they would faye, Carens mente: which fignifieth wanting wit, for the very furie that taketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirite. For in Latine Carere, betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, siguifieth wit. As for the feast of Palilia, we hauctolde of it before: but the feast of Lupercalia, considering the time of celebrating thereof, it seemeth it is ordeined for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate dayes of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging dayes. The dayes in the olde time on which they did celebrate the same, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feast, is as much to saye, as the feast of woulues. Wherefore it seemeth to be a feast of great antiquitie, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with E Enader: albeit the name of wouldes is as comon to the females, as the males, & so it might perhappes be called, by reason of the woulfe that brought vp Romalus. For we see those which ronne vp & down the cittie that daye, & they call Luperci, doe beginne their course in the very place where they faye Romulus was cast out. Howbest many things are done, whereof the originall cause were hard now to be coniectured. For goates about a certaine time of theyere are killed, then they bring two young boyes, noble mens fonnes, whose foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloude of the goates that are facrificed . By & by they drye their forheads with wolle dipped in milke. The the yong boyes must laughe immediately after they haue dried their forheads. That done they cut the goates skinnes, & make thongs of the, which they take in their hands,& ronne with them all about the cittle starck naked (sauing they haue F a clothe before their fecrets) and so they strike with these thonges all they metein their waye. The yonge wives doe never shonne them at all, but are well conteted to be striken with them, beleeuing fawe they could have no inflice bicaufe of Tains: watched him one daye as he facrificed with Romulus, in the cittle of Lauinium, and stabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather prayfed him for a good and righteous prince. Romulus caused the bodye of Tatius to be straight taken vp, and buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place nowe called Armilustrium. Further he neuer shewed any countenaunce to reuenge his death. There are some Historiographers that write, that those of the cittie of Laurentum being afeard at this murder, dyd deliuer forthwith to Romalus the murderers of the ambassadours. He notwiths & B ding dyd let them goe againe, faying: one murder was requited by another. This gaue some occasion of speache to thincke, he was glad he was rydde of his companion: yet the Sabynes neither sturred nor rebelled for all this, but some of them were affrayed of him for the great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honour they gaue him as a god, continuing still in duetie & obedience towards him. Diuers straugers also had Romulus valiancie in great honour: as amongest other, those who then were called the auncient Latines, which fent ambassadours to him to make league and amitie with him. He deuised to take the cittie of Fidenawhichwas nere neighbour to Rome. Some saye he tooke it vpon a sodaine, hauing sent before certen horse men to breake downe the hookes & hingewes with force, which the gates hang by: & him self came after with the rest of his armie, and stale vpon them, before the cittie C mistrusted any thing. Other write that the Fidenates first inuaded his courtye, and foraged vnto the very suburbes of Rome, where they did great harme : and howe Romulus layed an ambuthe in their waye as they returned home, and slewe a great number of them. When he tooke their cittie, he did not rafe it, but made a colonye of it, (as a place to fend the ouerincrease of Rome vnto) whether he sent afterwards two thousand five hundred Romains to inhabite there: & it was on the thirtenth daye of Aprill, which the Romaines call the Ides of the fame moneth. Not long after there role such a great plague in Rome, that men died lodainely, and were not ficke: the earth brought forth no fruite: bruite beafts deliuered no increase of their kynde: there rayned also droppes of bloude in Rome, as they saye. In so much as besides the cuills men selt in this extremitie, they fell in a marueilous feare of the wrathe of the goddes. Afterwards percei- D uing the like happened to the inhabitants of Lauretum, then euery man judged it was the very vengeance and heavie hand of the goddes, who plagued and punished these two citties for the murder committed vpon Tatius, and the ambaffadours that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both fides were apprehended, and executed: and these plagues by and by ceased both in the one and in the other cittie. Romulus befides, did purifie the cities with certaine facrifices that he deuised, which they keepe still at this daye, at the gate called Ferentina. But before the plague ceased, the Camerines came to affaulte the Romaines, & had ouercomen all the countrie, supposing they should not be able to withstand them, bicause they had bene so foretroubled with the plague. Yet notwithstading, Romulus set up on them with his army, & wanne the field of them, in which conflict there were flaine about fixe thousand men . After the battell Edone, he tooke their cittie, & conueyed to Rome the one half of the inhabitans that remained. After this, he sent twise as many Romaines as there were naturall Cameria's left at Camerine, to dwell there among them. This was done the first daye of August: so great was the multitude of the inhabitats of Rome that had increased in fixteene yeres from the first foundation of the cittie. Emong other spoyles hegot there, he caried away a charret of brasse with source horses, which he caused to be set vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne statue vpon it, and victorie crowning him with a garland triuphant. His power being growen thus great, his weake neighbours did submit themselves vnto him, being contented to live in peace by him. His stronger neighbours were affrayed of him, and enuied much his greatnes, and dyd take it no good policie to suffer him thus to rise in the face of the world, and thought it meetes pedilie to dawnte F his glorie, and clippe his winges. The first of the Thuscans that bent their power against him, were the Veians, who had a great countrie, & dwelled in a stronge and mightie cittie. To picke

A agrarrell to him, they fent to haue redeliuered to the the cittle of FIDENA, which they laved beloged vnto them. This was thought not only vnreasonable, but a thing worthy laughing ati coffdering that all the while the FIDENATES were in warre, & daunger, the THYSCANS never came to their ayde, but had fuffered them to be flayne, and then came to demaunde their lands and renements, when other had possession of them. Therefore Romulus hauling genen theman aunswer full of mockerie, and derision, they divided their power into two armies, and sent the one against them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards Rome. That which went against the cittle of FIDENA, preuayled, and killed there two thousand RO MAINES: the other was ouerthrowen and discomfited by Romalus, in which there dyed eight thousand VEIANS. Afterwards, they met againe somewhat neere the cittle of the FIDENATES, where B they fought a battell: and all dyd confesse, the chiefest exployte was done by Romalus owne. The incredi-is out of all compasse of beliefe and possibilitie. For they write, there were fourteene thousand men flayne at that battell, & that more then halfe of them were flayne by Romulus own hands, & the rather for that every maniudgeth it a vaine bragge and oftentation which the Massa-NIANS reporte of Aristomenes, who offered in facrifice to the goddes three hundred beaftes of victorie, as for fo many LACED & MONIAN shim felf had flayne in the battell, Their armie being thus broken, Romalus suffered them to flye who by swiftnes could faue them felues, and marched with all his power in good arraye towards their cittie. The cittizens then considering their late great losse and ouerthrowe, would not hazard the daunger of withstanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition & fute for peace, All was graunted them Remulus we went out an together, can they should for goe their territorie called Septemagium, that was these with the wenth parte of their countrye: & yeld to the ROMAINES all their falt houses by the rivers fide, Viene, and deliver fiftie of their chiefest citaizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entrie and triumphe into Rome for them, the daye of the Ides of October, which is the liftenth daye of the fame moneth, leading in his triumphe many prisoners taken in those warres: & among other; the generall of the VELANS, a very auncient man who fondly behaved him felle in his charge, and shewed by his doings, that his experience was farre shorte for his yeres in the warres. And

D from thence it commeth, when they offer to the goddes to gene thanckes for this victorie, that even at this daye, they bring to the capitoll throughe the market place an old man apparelled in a purple robe, & with a Iuell called Bulls about his necke, which the gentlemens young children weare about their neckes: & a heraulde goeth harde by him, crying, who buyeth who, the SARDIANIANS, bicause they holde opinion the Thy scans are come of the SARDIANIANS and the very cittle of VEIEs standeth in the countrie of THYSCANE. This was the laste warre that Romulus had offered him : after which he could not beware of that which is wonte to happen almost to all those, who by sodaine prosperitie, and fortimes speciall fauour, are raised to highe and greatestate. This president taught the noble men of ROME, to feeke and defire to have a free estate, where no subject should be at the commaundement of a King alone, and where every man should commaund & obey as should be his course. Those which were called Patricians in Rome, dyd medle with nothing, but had onely an honorable name and robe, and were called to counfaill rather for a facion, then to have their aduife or counfaile. For when they were affembled together, they dyd onely heare the Kings pleasure and commaundement, but they might not speake one word, and so departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the Comon wealthe, fauing they were the first that dyd knowe what was done. Howbeit Romulus vanished away sodainely, there was nei-

Therfore some haue thought that the whole Senatours fell ypon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peces, euery one caried awaye a pece of him, folded close in the multi death. skyrte of his robe. Other thincke also, this vanishing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the presence of the Senatours only: but they saye that Romulus was at that time without the D cittie, neere the place called the goates marthe, where he made an oration to the people, and that fodainely the weather chaunged, and ouercast so terribly, as it is not to be tolde nor credited. For first, the sunne was darckned as if it had bene very night: this darcknes was not in a calme or still, but there fell horrible thunders, boysterous windes, and flashing lightnings on euery side, which made the people ronne awaye, and scatter here and there, but the Senatours kept fill close together. Afterwardes when the lightning was past and gone, the daye cleared vp,&the element waxed fayer as before. Then the people gathered together againe, & fought for the King: asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not fuffer them to enquireany further after him, but counselled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in steade of a good King, he would be vnto them a mercifull E & gratious god. The meaner forte of people (for the most parte of them) tooke it well, & were very glad to heare thereof: & went their waye worthipping Romalus in their hartes, with good hope they should prosper by him. Howbeit some seeking out the trothe more egerly did cober fore, and troubled the Patricians: accusing them, that they abused the common people with vaine & fonde perfuafions, whileft them felues in the meane time had murdered the King with their owne hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, some saye there was one Iulius Proentus, the noblest of all the Patricians, being esteemed for a maruelous honest man, & knowen to have benevery familier with Romalus, & came with him from the cittle of A L B A: that stepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greatest and holyest othes a man might fiveare) that he had met Romulus on the waye, farre greater and fayerer, then he had feene him: renee before, and armed all in white armour, shyning bright like fire: whereat being affrayed in that forte to fee him, heasked him yet: O King, why hast thou thus left and for faken vs, that are

As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protectour, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These wordes seemed credible to the ROMAINES, aswell for the honefty of the man that spake them, as for the solemne other he made before them all. Yet I wote not how, some celestiall motion, or dinine inspiration helped it much for no man saved a word B against it. And so all suspition and accusation layed aside, every man began to call youn Qui- Rommlus calrinus, to praye vnto him, and to worthippe him. Truely this tale is much like the sales that the led Quirinus GRECIANS tellof Aristeas the proconnesian, & of Cleamedes the Astypalaian. For they saye, and god.

that Aristens dyed in a fullers worke house, & his friends comming to carie awaye his bodye, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: & at that inftant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his waye towards taken out of the cittle of CROTONA. It is fayed also that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally strong manifest at and great, and therewithall madde, and furious hastie. For after many desperate partes he had dead. played, he came at the laft on a daye into a schoole house full of little children, the roofe wherof Cleomeder Awas borne with one piller, which he dyd hit with so terrible a blowe of his fifte, that he brake product ye C it in the middelt, so as the whole roofe felland dashed the poore children in peces. Whereupon they brake the cheft all in peces, but they found the man neither quicke nor dead. Whereat they were marueilously amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the prophetesse aunswered them in this verse: Cleomedes the last of the demy goddes.

The reporte goeth also that Alemenes corfe dyd vanishe awaye, as they caried it to buriall, and howe in steade thereof they founde a stone layed in the beere. To conclude, mentell many dy vanished other suche wonders, that are farre from any apparance of trothe: only bicause they would out of the D make men to be as goddes, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reproue and been denie diuine power, it were a lewde and wicked parte: euen so to compare earthe and heauen together, itwere a mere follie. Therefore we must let suche fables goe, being most certaine that as Pindarus fayeth it is true.

Echeliuing corps, must yelde at last to deathe, and every lifemust leese his vitall breathe: The foule of man, that onely lives on hie, and is an image of eternitie.

For from heaven it came, and thither agains it dothe returne, not with the bodye, but then soonest, when the sowle is furthest of and separated from the bodye, and that she is kept holy, E & is no more defiled with the flesh . It is that the philosopher Heraclitus ment, when he sayed. The drye light, is the best soule which syeth out of the bodye, as lightning dothe out of the Haracilius clowde: but that which is joyned with the bodye being full of corporall paffions, is a groffe foring of the vapour,darke and maffie, & cannot flame, ryfe or shoote out like lightning. We must not beleeue therefore, that the bodyes of noble and vertuous men, doe goe vp together with their foules into heauen, against the order of nature. But this we are certainely to beleeue, that by the vertues of their foules (according to diume nature and inflice) they doe of men become faincts, and of faincts halfe goddes, and of halfe goddes, entier and perfect goddes: after that they are perfectly (as it were by facrifices of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine & mortalitie, & not by any civill ordinance, but in trothe & reason, they receaue a speare or darte, which have shewed them selves valiant in the warres: and that for this cause Romalus was furnamed Quirinus, as who would faye, god of the speares and warres. There was fince buylt a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and so named of him. The daye whereon he vanished, is called the flying of the people, or otherwise the Nones of the goates, For on that daye, they goe out of the cittie to doe facrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the goates marshe: and the Romaines call a goate, Capra. As they goe thus together, they call with lowde showtes and cryes vpon divers Romaines names, as Marcus, Cneus, and Gains, in token of the flying that was then: and that they called one another backe againe, as they ranne awaye in great feare and disorder. Howbeit other saye, that it is not done to shewe the ronning awaye, but to thewe their spede and diligence, and referre it to the storie. Nowe after the GAVLES that had taken Rome were expulsed by Camillus, the cittle was so weakned, that they could scante recouer their force and strength againe: wherfore many of the LATINES.ioyning together, went with a great mightie armie, vnder the conducte of Liuius Post humius, to warre against the Romaine s. This Posthumius brought his campe as neere the cittle of Rome as he could,& fent to the ROMAINES by a trumper to let them understand, how the LATINES WERE defirous by newe mariages, to restore their olde auncient amitie and kinred that was neere Theseus with Romulus.

HVS have we declared all things of Thefeus and Romulus worthy me-HV S naue we declared an unique of the other, it appeareth first that morie. But to compare the one with the other, it appeareth first that The feus of his owne voluntarie will, without compulsion of any (when Ey what he might with safety haue reigned in the cittle of TROEZEN, and suc- meanes men ceeded his grandfather in no small kingdome) dyd defire of him selfe, are prouoked and rather fought meanes to aspire to great things: and that Romulus terprifes. on the other fide, to deliuer him felf from bondage and feruitude that laye fore you him, and to escape the threatned punishment which still dyd hange ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato fayeth) Plato in to shewe him selfe hardie for feare: who seeing howe extremely he was like to be handled. Fhadone.

R was of very force constrained to seeke aduenture, and hazarde the enterprise of atteining highe and great things. Moreouer the chiefest acte that euer he dyd was, when he slewe one onely tyranne of the cittie of ALBA called Amulius: where Thefeus in his iorney only , as he trauelled, gaue his minde to greater enterprises, and slewe Seiron, Sinnis, Procrustes, and Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the worlde, he deliuered GRECE of all those cruell tyrannes, before any of those knewe him whom he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might have gone to ATHENS by sea, and neuer needed to have travelled, or put him selfe in daunger with these robbers, considering he neuer receyued hurte by any of them: where as Romulus could not be in safetie whilest Amulius lived. Hereupon it maye be alledged, that The few vnprouoked by any private wronge or hurte receyved, dyd fet vpon the fe detestable theues and robbers: Remus and Romulus contrariwife, so longe as the tyranne dyd them no harme, dyd fuffer him to oppresse and wronge all other. And if they alledge these were noble dedes, and worthy memorie: that Romulus was hurte fighting against the SABYNES, and that he fleweking Acron with his owne handes, and that he had ouercome and fubdued many of fering him selse to be deuowred by a cruell beaste, or els to be slayne and sacrificed upon the tumbe of Androgeus, or to become bondslaue & tyed in captiuitie to the vile service of cruell men and enemies, if by his corage and manhodde he could not deliuer him felf. This was fuch D an acte of magnanimitie, iustice & glorie, & briefly of so great vertue, that it is vnpossible truely to be fet out. Surely me thinckes the philosophers dyd not ill define loue, when they sayd she was a seruitour of the goddes, to saue younge folkes, whom they thought meete to be preser- Lone the miued. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the worke of some god, and a meane pur-nifter of the posely prepared for Theseus safety. Therefore the woman is not to be reproached nor blamed his enemies. Then for Thefeus on thother fide may be obiected, the battell of the CENTAVRI, the warres of the AMAZONE s, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: and howe heventered to goe himselse thither with the other young boyes and wenches of ATHENS, as willingly ofyelde and submit them selues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a wayting mayde called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gave them counsell to doe neither the one nor the other, but to vie a pollicy with them, by meanes whereof they should scape the daunger of the warres, and should also not be tyed nor bounde by any pledges. The deuise was, they should send to the L ATINES her selfe, and a certaine number of their fayrest bonde maydes, trimmed up like gentlewomen and the best cittizens daughters, and that in the night she would lifte them vp a burning torche in the aver, at which figne they should come armed, and set vpontheir enemies as they laye a fleepe. This was brought to paffe: and the LATINES thought D verely they had bene the Romaines daughters. Philoris fayled not in the night to lyft up her figne, and to shewe them a burning torche in the toppe of a wilde figge tree: and dyd hange certaine couerlets and clothes behinde it, that the enemies might not fee the light, and the Ro-MAINES contrariwise might decerne it the better. Thereupon so sone as the Romaines sawe it, they ranne with all spede, calling one another by their names, and issued out of the gates of the cittie with great haste: and so tooke their enemies ypon a sodaine, and slewe them. In memorie of which victorie, they doe yet solemnise the feaste called the Nones of the goates, bicause of the wilde figge tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they doe feast the women without the cittie, under shadowes made of the boughe of figge trees. The wayting maydes, they ronne vp and downe, and playe here and there together. Afterwards they feeme to fight, and throwe P stones one at another, as then they dyd when they holpe the ROMAINES in their fight . But fewe writers doe anowe this tale, bicause it is on the daye time that they call so eche other by their names, and that they goe to the place which they call the goates marthe, as vnto a facrifice. It feemeth this agreeth better with the first historie when they called one another by their names in the night, going against the LATINES: onles peraduenture these two thinges after many yeres happened vpon one daye.

Furthermore, they faye Romulus was taken out of the worlde, when he was foure and fiftie yeres of age, and had raigned eight and thirtie yeres by accompt.

for the loue she bare Thesew, but rather it is muche to be wondred at, that every man and wo- A man in like wife dydnot loue him. And if of her felfe she fell in loue with him, I save (and not without cause) she afterwards deserved to be beloued of a god, as one that of herowne nature loued valiantnes and honour, and entertained men of finguler value. But both Thefeus and Romulus being naturally genen to rule and raigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a King, but bothe of them dyd degenerate alike: the one chaunging him felf into a popular man, the other to a very tyranne. So that by fundrie humours, they both fell into one mischief and errour. For a prince aboue all things must keepe his estate: which is no lesse pre-The office of ferued by doing nothing vncomely, as by doing all things honorably. But he that is more feuere or remisse then he should be remaineth now no more a King or a prince, but becommeth a people pleaser, or a cruell tyrante: and so causeth his subjects to despise or hate him. Yet me R thinckes the one is an errour of to muche pittie and basenes: and the other of to muche pryde and crueltie. But if we may enot charge fortune with all mischaunces happening vnto men, but that we ought to consider in them the diuersities of manners and passions, seeing anger is vnreasonable, and wrathe rashe and passionate: then can we not clere the one, nor excuse the other of extreme rage and passion, in the facte committed by the one against his brother, and by the other against his naturall sonne. Howbeit the occasion and beginning of anger doth muche excuse Theseus, who moued with the greatest cause that might be, was put into suche choller and passion. But if Romulus variaunce with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counsell, or cause of the common weales: there is none so simple to thincke, that his wisdome would so sodainely haue set vpon him. Where as Theseus in contrarie manner killed his C sonne, prouoked by those passions that fewe men can auoyde: to wit, loue, ielousie, and false reporte of his wife. Moreouer Romulus anger went to the effect, whereof the iffue fell out very lamentable: The few anger stretched no further, then to roughe wordes, and olde folkes curses in their heate. For it feemeth, curfed fortune, and nought els, was the cause of his sonnes only milhappe, as forespoken and withed for somewhat by his father. These be the speciall things maye be alledged for The feus. But for Romulus this was anoble thing in him . First his begin-with their conquerours. And in the beginning, he neuer chaunged nor increased any cittie that was buylt before, but buylt him felfe a newe cittie out of the grounde, getting all together, land, countrie, kingdome, kinred and mariages, without losing or killing any man: and to the contrarie, rather he dydgood to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrie, lands, nor houses, and desired nothing els but to make a people amongest them, and to become citti-dued by force of armes many mightie and puissant people: he tooke citties, and triumphed ouer Kings and Princes which he had vanquished in battell . And touching the murder of Rezens of some cittie. Also Romulus bent not him selfe to follow theeues and robbers, but sub- E ning being very lowe and meane, and his brother and he taken for bonde men, and the childrenof hoggeheards, before they were them selues all free, they set at libertie in manner all the LATINES, winning at one instant many titles of glorie and honour: as distroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of newe citties, and no ouerthrowers of the olde, where as Theseus of many habitations and houses made onely one, and dyd ouerthrowe and plucke downe divers states, bearing the names of auncient Kings, red before Thefeus. princes, and halfe goddes of ATTICA. All these also dyd Romulus afterwards, and compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to distroye their owne houses, and to come and dwell mus, it is not certainely knowen of whose hands he dyed. The most parte of authors doe charge Romulus love other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus delivered his mother from appa-.rant death, and restored his grandsather to the royall throne of Aneas, who before was deposected for

fed and brought from a King to feruill obedience, without any regarde of honour or dignitie: to whom he dyd many moe great pleasures and seruices. Besides he neuer offended him willingly, no not fo muche as ignorantly. Contrarylie I thincke of Thefews, who fayling by negligence to put out his white fayle at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, howe eloquent an oration soeuer could be made for his excuse: yea though it were before the most fauora- F ble iudges that could be. Wherefore an Athenian very well perceyuing that it was an harde thing to excuse and defend so sowle a faulte, dothe fayne that the good olde man Ægeus

A hauing newes brought him that his sonnes shippe was at hand, dyd ronne in so great hasteto his castell, to see his some arrive a farre of, that as he ranne, his soote hit against some thing. and ouerthrewe him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man feeing him ronne so hastely to the sea side, dyd make haste to attende and wayte vpon him. Furthermore, Thefeus faults touching women and rauishements, of the twaine, had the leffe shadowe and culler of honestie. Bicause Theseus dyd attempt it very often; for he stale awaye Theseus deinadowe and current of noticine. Steam of regions and attention of the state of the age, and past mariage: he stale awaye Helen in her minoritie, being nothing neere to consent of women. to marve. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACED ENO-NIANS, and the AMAZONES (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birthe and

B linadge of his owne countrie which were at ATHENS, and descended of the noble race and progenie of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) dyd geue men occasion to suspect that his womannithenes was rather to fatisfie lust, then of any great loue . reste to his best and most honest cittizens. Afterwardes by the honour, loue, and good entertainment that he caused them to have & receive of their husbands, he chaunged this violent force of rauishement, into a most perfect bonde and league of amitie: which dyd so knyt and iovne in one these two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall loue which grewe afterwards betwext those two people, and consequently of the loyning of their powers C together. Furthermore, time hath geuen a good testimonie of the loue, reuerence, constancie. kyndenes, and all matrimoniall offices that he established by that meanes, betwext man and wife. For in two hundred and thirtie yeres afterwards, there was neuer man that durst forsake or put awaye his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the best lear- No divorce

It was one called Spurius Carvilius, bicause his wife was barren and had Max. Sayeth no children. The effects also doe agree with the testimonie of the time. For the Realme was The first wife common vnto Kings of both nations, and through the alliance of these mariages that be- put awaye in ganne first of rauishements, both nations lived peaciblie, and in equalitie, vnder one civill po-D licie, and well gouerned common weale. The ATHENIANS contrariewife, by Thefeus mariages, dyd get neither loue nor kynred of any one persone, but rather they procured warres. Theseum maenmities, & the flaughter of their cittizens, with the losse in the ende of the cittie of APHID-NES: and yet very hardely, and by the mercie of their enemies (whom they honored as godds) grouples. they escaped for him, the daunger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the self acte done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the last, that his mother was not only in daunger, but euen feelingly fuffered like miserie and captiuitie, which Hecuba dyd afterwards, when she was for laken of her fonne: onles peraduenture those things that they write of the imprisonment and captiuitie of Æthra, be founde falle, and but fables, as for the fame and memorie of Theseus were behouefull, that both it, and many other things also, were of no more trothe nor

MAN cannot speake anything at all of Lyeurgus, who made the A lawes of the LACEDEMONIANS, but he shall finde great contrarietie of him amongest the historiographers. For of his parentage & trauaill out of his countrie, of his deathe and making of lawes, of his forme and gouernment, and order of executing the same, they have written diuerfely. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worst about the time he lived in . For some of them (and Ariforle is of that number) will needes have him to have bene in the time

all warres should cease during the feast of the games olympicall: for a testimonie whereof, they alledge the copper covte which was vsed to be throwen in those games, and had founde B grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compting the dayes and time of the succession of the kings of LACED EMON (as Eratosthenes, and Apollodorus) saye he was many yeres before the first Olympiades. Timeus also thincketh there were two of this name, and in divers times: howbeit the one having more estimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glorie of both their doings. Some saye the eldest of the twaine, was not longe after Homer: and some write they sawe him. Xenophon sheweth vs plainely he was of great antiquitie: saying he was in lib.de Lacethe time of the Heraclides, who were neerest of bloude by descent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon ment not those Heraclides, which descended from Hercules self: for the last kings of of the Hora. SPARTA were of Hercules progenie, aswell as the first. which doubtles were the first and nearest before Hercules time. Neuertheles though the historiographers haue written diuersely of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we finde Cleme. Strom. written of him in auncient histories, and is least to be denied, and by best testimonies most to be prooued. And first of all, the poet Simonides sayeth, his father was called Prytanis and not Euromust and the most parte doe write the pettigree otherwise, aswell of Lycurgus self, as of Eunomus. For they laye, that Patrocles the sonne of Aristodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begate Prytanis, and Prytanis begat Eunomus, and Eunomus begat Polydectes of his first wife, and Lycurgus of the second wife, called Dianassa: yet Euthychidas an other writer, maketh Lycurgus the fixte of descent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleventh after Hercules. But of all his auncesters, the noblest was Sous, in whose time the cittie of Sparta subdued the

A Ilores, and made them flaues, and dydenlarge and increase their dominion, with the lands and possessions they had got by conquest of the Arcadians. And it is sayed that Som him self being on a time straightly belieged by the CLITORIAN s,in a hard drye grounde, where no water could be founde: offered them thereupon to restore all their lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his companie dyd drincke of a fountaine that was there not farre of. The CLITORIANS dyd graunte vnto it, and peace also was sworne betweene them. Then he A subsill ore-called all his fouldiers before him, and tolde them if there were any one amongest them that miss. would refrayne from drincking, he would refigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his companie that could(or would) for beare to drincke, they were so fore a thirst. So they all drancke hartely except him felf, who being the last that came downe, dydno more but B a litle moyste his mowthe without, and so refreshed him self, the enemies selues standing by, and drancke not a droppe. By reason whereof, he refused afterwards to restore their lands he had promifed, alledging they had not all droncke. But that notwithstanding, he was greately esteemed for his actes, and yet his house was not named after his owne name: but after his sonnes name Eurytion, they of his house were called Eurytionides. The reason was, bicause his fonne Eurytion to please the people, dyd first let fall and geue ouer, the sole and absolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwardes marueilous disorder and dissolution, which continued a great time in the cittle of Sparta. For the people finding them felues at libertie, became very bolde and disobedient; and some of the Kinges that succeeded, were hatedeuen to deathe, bicause they woulde perforce vse their auncient authoritie C ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and goodwilles of the people, or bicause they fawe they were not stronge enough to rule them, dyd geue them selues to dissemble. And this dyd so muche increase the peoples lose and rebellious mindes, that Lycurgus owne father being Kinge, was flayne among them. For one daye, as he was parting a fraye betweene two that were fighting, he had suche a wounde with a kytchin knyfe, that he dyed: and left his Realme to his eldest sonne Polydectes, who dyed also sone after, and without heyre of his bodye as was supposed. In so muche as enery man thought Lycurgus should be Kinge: and so he tookeit vpon him, vntill it was vnderstoode that his brothers wife was younge with childe. Which thing so some as he perceyued, he published openly, that the Realme belonged to the childe that should be borne, if it were a sonne. After this he gouerned the Realme,

D but as the Kings lieutenante and regent. The LACED & MONIANS call the regents of their Kinges that are left within age, Prodices. Lycurgus brothers widowe dyd fend, and let him Prodices. fecretly understande, that if he would promise to marye her when he should be King, that Regents, or the would come before her time, and either miscarye, or destroye that she went with . Lycur- prostfour of gus deteltably abhorring this brutishe and sauage vnnaturalines of the woman, dyd not reiect her offer made him, but seemed rather to be very glad, then to dislike of it. Neuertheles he fent her worde againe, she should not neede to trye masteryes, with drinckes and medicines to make her come before her time: for fo doing, the might bring her felfe in daunger, and be cast awaye for euer. Howbeit he aduised her to goe her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he would finde meanes enough to make awaye the childe that E should be borne. And so with suche persuasions he drewe on this woman to her full time of deliuerie. But so soone as he perceyued she was neere her time, he sent certaine to keepe her, and to be present at her laboure, commaunding them that if she were brought a bed of a daughter, they should leave her with the woman: and if it were a sonne, they should forthwith bring it to him, in what place soeuer he was, and what busines soeuer he had in hand. It chaunced that the came euenabout supper time, and was deliuered of a sonne. As he was fitting at the table with the other magistrates of the cittie, his seruants entred the halle, and prefented to him the lile babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes, and fayed openly to them that were present: beholde my lordes of SPARTA, here is a Kinge borne Charilans. vnto vs. And speaking these wordes, he layed him downe in the Kinges place, and na- Lacedamo-

Thus he fawe all the loo- nians, Hered. kers on rejoycing muche, and might heare them prayle and extoll his synceritie, justice, find Halle, and vertue. he was taken and efteemed fo inft and syncere a man among the cittizens, that there were moe a that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the Kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithstading there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who sought to hinder & difgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kinred of the Kings mother: whose power and honour were thought much impayred by Lycurgus authoritie. In fo much, as a brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a daye, dyd not sticke to say to his face. I knowe for a certaintic one of these dayes thou wilt be King: meaning thereby to bring him in suspition with the cittizens. Which thing though Lycurgus neuer ment, yet of a fubtill and craftie wit Leonidas thought by geuing out such words, that if the young King happened to dye in his minoritie naturally, it would be mistrusted that Lycurgus had secretly made him awaye . The Kings mother also gaue out such B like speaches, which in the end dyd so trouble him, with the feare he had, what euet might fall out thereof: that he determined to departe his countrie, and by his absence to auoyde the sufpition that therein might growe vpon him any waye. So he trauelled abroade in the worlde as a straunger, vntill his nephew had begotten a sonne who was to succeede him in his kingdome.

He having with this determination taken his iorney, went first of all into CRETA, where he diligently observed and considered the manner of their living, the order of the government of their Comon weale, and euer kept company with the best, and euer was conferring with the most learned. There he founde very good lawes in his judgement, which he noted of purpose to carie home to his countrie, to ferue when time should come. He founde there other lawes alfo, but of them he made no reckoning. Nowe there was one manthat about the reft was reputed wife and skilfull in matters of state & gouernment, who was called Thales: with whom

Lycurgus dyd fo much by intreatie, and for familier friendshippe, that he persuaded him to goe and name: but in effect he fange all that the best and sufficientest gouernours of the worlde could deuise. For all his songes were goodly ditties, wherein he dyd exhorte and persuade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace & concorde one with the other. His words were fet out with fuch tunes, countenance, & accents, that were fo full of swetenes, harmony, to compare them with the ficke & diseased. It is very likely it was there, where he first sawe Ho-with him vnto Sparta. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and pearfing: that inwardly it melted mens heartes, and drue the hearers of a loue to like the most honest things, and to leaueall hatred, enmitie, sedition, and diussion, which at that time reigned fore amog them. So as it maye be fayed, he it was that prepared the waye for Lycurgus, D whereby heafterwards reformed and brought the LACED & MONIANS VIIto reason. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into ASIA, with intent(asit is fayed) to compare the maner of life and pollicie of those of CRETA (being then very straight and seuere) with the supersuities and vanities of I ONIA: and thereupon to confider the difference between their two manners & gouernments, as the physitian doth, who to knowe the hole & healthfull the better, doth vse mers works, in the hands of the heires & fucceffours of Cleophylus: & finding in the fame, aswell many rules of pollicie, as the great pleasure of Poets faining, he diligently coppied it out, and made avolume thereof to carie into GRECE. It is true there was much fame abroad of Homers poesies among the Grecians, howbeit there were sewe of them brought together, but were R fcattered here & there in divers mens hands, in pampflets & peces vnfowed & without any order: but the first that brought them most to light amog men, was Lycurgus. The ÆGYPTIANS mes unknowe faye, that he was in their countrie also, & that having founde thereone notable ordinaunce among other, that their fouldiers and men of warre were separated from the rest of the people, he brought the practife of it into SPARTA: where fetting the marchants, artificers, & labourers euery one a parte by them selues, he did establish a noble Comon wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN historiographers, and some others also of GRECE doe write. He was also in AFRICK E, and in Spayne, & as farre as India, to conferre with the wife men there, that were called the philosophers of India. I knowe no man that hathe written it, sauing Aristocrates, that was Hipparchus sonne. The LACEDEMONIANS wished for him often when he was gone, and sent F diuers and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maiestie of a prince, whereby they dyd excell the common people.

A: people.But as for Lyeurgue, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to comaund, and to geue order, as having in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to drawe men willingly to obeye him. Moreouer the Kings them selues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, bicause they hoped that his presence would somwhat brydle, & restrayne the people from their infolencie & disobediece towards them. Whereupon Lycurgus returning home pie in this opinion and affection of men, it fellout that he was no fooner arrived, but he beganne to Irangua redeuise howe to alter the whole gouernment of the common weale, & throughout to chaunge through and the whole course and order of the state: thincking that to make only certaine particular lawes changeth all the whole could and order of the transfer one thould geue some easie medicine, to purge an ouerthrowen bodye with all humours and diffeafes. Therefore he thought first that all groffe & su-1/1

When he had thus determined with him felf, before he would take in had to doe any thing, he went to the citty of DELPHES: where after he had facrificed to Apollo, he cofulted with him about his matters. This aunswer dyd comforte him verymuch, & so he beganne to breake his purpose to certen of the chief of the cittie, & secretly to praye & exhortethem to helpehim, going first to those he knew to be his friends, & after by litle & litle he wanne others to him, who ioyned with him in his enterprise. So when he saw the time fit for the matter, he caused thirtie of the chiefest men of the cittie in a morning to comeinto the market place well appointed & furnished, to suppresse those that would attept to hinder their purpole. Hermippus the historiographer rehearleth twentie of the chiefest: but he that about all others dyd most assist him in his doings, & was the greatest ayde vnto the stablithing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadas. The king Charilaus hearing of this affembly, dyd fearethere had benefome conspiracie or insurrection against his person,& for his safety he fled into the temple of Iuno, called Chalceacos, as much to faye, as Iunos brafen teple. And how should I not (& he)be good, when I cannot be ettill to the euill. In this chauge of the state, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefest alteration was, his lawe of the erection of a Senate, which he made to have a regall power & equall authoritie with the Kings in matters of weight & im himmeth a Seportance, & was (as Plato fayeth) to be the healthfull counterpease of the whole bodye of the Comon weake The other Rate before was ever wavering fortime inclining to tyranic, when Lacedsmothe Kings were to mighties & formtime to cotulion, when the people would viurpe authoritie. Howbeit Spharus writeth, that number of the from the beginning, he never purposed to have more then eight and twenty to be the Senate. And perhappes he had great regard to make it a perfect number, confidering it is compoundod by the number of feuen , multiplied by foure; and is the first perfect number next to fixe, being equal to all partes garhered together. but the respectiones, adding to that number , the two Kinges, Lycurgus tooke fo great care to attabilibervell this countell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apolloes temple in Yings

the place, where he faveth:

Remasf Ly- DELPHES. This oracle is called vinto this daye Retra, as who would fave, the statute oracles a whereof the aunswer was. When thou hast built a temple vnto Inpiter the Syllanian, and to Misnerus the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou shalt stablishe a Senate of thirtie counsellers, with the two Kings: & shalt assemble the people at times convenient in the place: betweene the bridge and the river Gnacion. There the Senatours shall propound all matters. and breake vp after their affemblies : and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speake one worde. In those dayes the people were euer assembled betweene two rivers, for there was no hall to affemble a counfaill at large, nor any other place prepared for them . For Lycurque thought no buylded place meete for men to geue good counfaill in, or to determine causes. but rather a hinderance: bicause in such places men be drawen to muse on vaine things, and their mindes be caried awaye with beholding the images, tables, and pictures, comonly fet vp R for ornamet in such open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and sportes be made, they thincke more of them, then any counsaill. Againe, if it be in a great hall, then of the faver embowed or vawted roofes, or of the fretifed feelings curiously wrought, and fumptuously set forth, and tend not still their busines they come for . When the people were affembled in counfaill, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counfell to be determined, neither might any of them deliver his opinion what he thought of any thinge: but the people had onely authoritie to gene their affent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senatours, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwardes, the two Kings Polydorus and Theopompus, bicause the people dyd many times crosse and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding some thing to it, they dyd adde these wordes & to the oracle aforefaid. That if the people would not affent to any ordinaunce of the Senate. then should it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake up the counsell, and to frustrate all things done in the same: the wife aduise of the Senate being encountered thus, & their meaning to the best, so peruerted to the worse. These two Kingspersuaded the people, that at the very first, this addition came with the oracle of Apollo: as the poet Tritam maketh mention in

The Kings (even they to wwhom of right there ought a louing care in princely breasts to boyle. the Spartane vealthe, to garde from every fooile: Shalbe the chief grave causes to decyde with Senatours: wwhole founde adulle is tride. Lycureus now having thus tempered the forme of his comon weale, it feemed not withfranding to those that came after him, that this small number of thirtie persones that made the Senate; was yet to mightie, & of to great authoritie. Wherefore to bridle them in a little they gaue them(as Plato fayeth)a bytte in their mouths, & that was the authoritie of the Ephtores, which fignifie as much as comptrollers : and were erected about a hundred and thirtie veres after the death of Lyeurgus. The first which was chosen of these, was Elatus, and it was in the time of king Theopompus, whose wife on a daye in her anger fayed: howe throughe his negligence he would leave leffe to his successours, then he had receyued of his predecessours, To whom he anniwe. red againe, not leffe but more, for that it shall continue lenger, and with a more sugreties For, in lofing thus their too absolute power, that wrought them great entite & hatred among their cittizens, they dydescape the danger & mischief that their neighbours the A neives; and Mas-SENIANS dydfeele: who would not gene ouer the foueraine authoritie which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgue great wildome and forelight manifeltly knowen; who to will deeply confider the feditions & ill gouernements of the A ke IVES,&MESSEWIANS (their neere neighbours and kinsemen) as well from the people, as from the Kings. Who from the be- F ginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: & in deuiding of their lands a farre better order then theirs. This notwithstanding, they did not prosper longe: but through the private of their

A Kings, and the disobedience of their people, they entred into civill warres one against another, thewing by their disorders & missortunes the speciall grace the godds dyd beare to SPARTA. to gene them such a reformer, as dyd so wisely temper the state of their common weale, as we will thewe hereafter. The second lawe that Lycurgus made, and the boldest and hardest he euer tooke in hande, was the making of a newe division of their lands. For he sawe so great a disorder, by cargui me-tooke In Hainus, vas the inhabitants, as well of the countrie, as of the citie LACEDEMON, by dissipn of reason some (and the greatest number of them) were so poore, that they had not a handfull of lander unio grounde, and other some being least in number were very riche, that had all: he thought with the chirema. him self tobanishe out of the cittie all insolencie, enuie, couetousnes, & deliciousnes, and also all riches and pouertie, which he tooke the greatest, and the most continuall plagues of a cittie. or common weale. For this purpose, he imagined there was none so ready and necessarie a meane, as to persuade his cittizens to suffer all the landes, possessions, and inheritance of their countrie, to ronne in common together: and that they should make a newe division equally in partition amongest them selues, to live from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, so that no one were richer the another, & none should seeke to go before eache other, any other wave then in vertue only: thincking there should be no difference or vnequalitie among inhabitants of one cittie, but the reproaches of dishonestie, & the prayles of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, dyd out of hande make a lawe of the diuision of their lands. For first he dyd deuide all the countrie of LACONIA, into thirtie thousand equall partes, the which All the lands he dyd fet out for those that inhabited about SPARTA: and of those landes that ioyned next throughs the ne dyd let out for mole that inhabited about SPARIA, and of those failures that royfled their committee of to the cittle of SPARIA, that was the chief metropolitan cittle of LACONIA, he made other Laconia, denine thousand partes, which he deuided to the naturall cittizens of SPARTA, who be those that wided into are properly called Spartans. Howbeit some will saye, he made but sixe thousand parts, & that king Polydorus afterwards dyd adde to other threethouland partes. Other fayealfo, that Lycur- about Sparia que of these nine thousand partes made but the halfe onely, & Polydorus the test. Euery one of into 9000 these partes was such, as might yelde vnto the owner yerely, three score and tenne bushels of barley for a man, and twelue bushels for the woman, and of wine & other liquide fruites, much prhat barley like in proportion: which quantitie Lycurgus indged to be sufficiet, to kepe the bodye of a man every parte in health, & to make him stronge & lustie, without any further allowance. They saye after this, did yelde. as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had bene reaped not longe before, and fawe the number of sheaues lying in euery shocketogether, & no one shocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, & told them that were with him, me thinks all LACONIAIS as it were an inheritance of many brethern, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue deuided also moueables, & to haue made a common partition betwene them, to thend he would have vtterly taken away all vnequalitie. But finding the cittizens tooke it very impatiently, that openly that which they had, thould be taken awaye: he went about to doe it more fecretly, and in a conninger wife to take away that couetoufnes. For first of all, he dyd forbid all covine of golde and syluer to be currant: & then he dyd set out cer- Lycingus taine coynes of iron which he commaunded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and changeth all quantitie was but litle worthe. So as to laye vp therof the value of tenne Minas, it would golde fine from haue occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would haue neded a yoke of oxen to carie it any where. Nowe golde & filuer being thus banished out of the countrie, many lewde partes & faultes must needes cease thereby. For who would robbe, steale, picke, take awaye, hyde, procure, or whorde vp any thing, that he had no great occasion to desire, nor any profit to possesse. nor would be any pleasure to vie or employe. For, the iron they occupied for their covne; they cast vineger vpon it while it was redde hotte out of the fire, to kill the strength & working of it to any othervie: for thereby it was fo eger & brickle, that it would byde no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other facion. By this meanes he banished also, all superfluous Lycares & vnprofitable sciences, which he knew he should not neede to doe by any proclamation; bi- made all see-cause they would fall awaye (or the most parte of them) euen of them selues, when the basenes en or man of the money they should take for their worke, should vadoe them. For their from moneys were not currant els where in the citties of GRECE, but enery bodye madea ieste of it there. By this occasion, the LACED & MONIANS could buye no forrein wares nor marchandises, neither LYCVRGVS. 50 came there any shippe into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any sine curious Retho- A rician dyd repaire into their countrie to teache them eloquence, & the cunning cast of lying: nor yet came there to them any wyfard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keepe any brothell house, nor yet goldsmithe or ineller, to make or fell any toyes or trifles of golde or filuer to set forth women: considering all these things are vsed to be made to get money, and to hourd vp that they had not. After this force, delicatenes that wanted many things that entertained it, beganne by litle and litle to vanishe awaye, & lastely, to fall of from them selues: when the most riche men had no more occasion then the poorest, and riches having no meane to shewe her selfe openly in the worlde, was fayne to remaine shut at home idely, as not able to doe her master any seruice. Thereupon moueables and householde stuffe (which a man cannot be without, and must be daylie occupied) as bedsteades, tables, chayers, and suche like necessa-B ries for house, were excellently well made: and men dyd greatly prayfe the facion of the L A-occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, nowe to drive awaye all su-perfluitie and deliciousnes, and to roote out vtterly desire to get and gather: he made another C

CONTAN cuppe which they called Cothon, and specially for a souldier in the warres, as Criticas Cothon a fraige kinde was wont to faye. For it was made after such a facion, that the culler of it dydlet the eye to discerne the fowle & vnwholsome water, which men are driven oftetimes to drinke in a campe, minian foul- and goeth many times against ones stomake to see it: and if by chaunce there was any filth or mudde in the bottome, it would cleaue and sticke fast vpon the ribbes of the bellie, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that drancke it. The reformer of their state was the cause of all this: bicause their artificers tending now no superfluous works, were thirde lawe for eating and drincking, and against feastes and banckets. First he willed and com-Lyangur ap- maunded the cittizens, that they should eate together all of one meate, and chiefly of those he pointeth order had permitted by his ordinance. Then he dyd expressely forbid them to eate alone, or a parte, the Laceda- or secretly by them selues, vpon riche tables and sumptuous beddes, abusing the labour of excellent worke men, and the deuises of likerous cookes to cramme them selves in corners, as they doe fatte vp beaftes and poultrie, which doth not only breede ill conditions in the minde, but dothe marre the complexions of men, and the good states of their bodie, when they give them selues ouer to such sensualitie and gluttonie. Whereof it followeth in the ende that men must needes sleepe muche, to helpe to disgest the excesse of meates they have taken, and then must they goe to the whotte houses to bathethem selues, and spendlong time about the D ordinarie attendance of their fickely bodyes. This was a marueilous thing for him to bring to passe, but much more, to make riches not to be stolen, and least of all to be coueted, as Theophrastus sayd of him: which by this meanes of making them eate together with all sobriety at their ordinarie dyet, was brought to passe. For there was no more meane to the riche, then to the poore, to vie to playe, or shewe riches, fithe both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: so as that which is commonly spoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blinde, was truely verified only in the cittie of SPARTA, aboue all other places of the worlde. For there riches was layed on the grounde like a corfe without a foule, that moueth no whit at all: considering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home secretly in his house, before he came to their open halles, nor might not come thither for a countenance E only to his meales, being already fedde and full fraight. For every mans eye was vpon those specially which did not eate & drincke with a good stomake amongest them: & it was the vse to reproche them as gluttons, and dayntie mouthed men, which refused to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they fave, that grieued most the riche aboue all that Lyeurgus made, and whereat they were most madde and angrie with him: in so muche, as on a daye, they all setting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to ronne out of the market place, and getting grounde of them, he recourred the liberties of a churche, before any could ouertake him: fauing one young man called Alcander, who otherwise had no ill nature in him, but that he was somewhat quicke of his hande, and cholericke with all. Who following Lyeurgus nerer then any other, dyd geue him a blowe ouerthwart the face with a staffe, and F strake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him . Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer bashed or made worde at the matter, but dyd lifte vp his head to those that followed him, and shewed them his face all a gore bloude, and his eye put out cleane: whereof they were all so fore ashamed, that there was not a man that durst once open his mouth against him, but to the contrarie, they seemed to pittie him, and dyd deliuer Alcander into his handes that had done the dede, to punishe him as him selfe pleased. And so they all brought him to his house, and thewed they were right hartely forie for his hurte. Lyeurgus thancking them, returned them all backe againe, faue that he made Alcander to goe with him into his house, where he neuer hurte him, nor gaue him fowle worde: but commaunded him onely to waite vpon him, Lycangus pa-and made his other ordinarie feruaunts to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now cience and beganne to spye his owne faulte, dyd most willingly attend vpon him, and neuer spake worde gentlener. to the contrarie. When he had ferued him a certaine time, being very nere continually about

R him he beganne to feele and tafte of his naturall liberalitie, and fawe of what affection and intention Lyeurgus was moued to doe all he dyd: he perceyued what was the seueritie of his ordinary life, and what his constancy was to endure labour without wearines. Alcander then beganne to loue and honour Lyeurgus from his harte, and tolde his parents and friends, howe he was no suche seuere man as he seemed, but was of so kynde and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I praye you howe Alcander was transformed by Lyeurgus, and his punishementalfo, which he should have received for of a fierce, rashe, and a lewde conditioned youth he was before, he became nowe a very graue and wife man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he furnamed Optiletide, bicause the Minerua DORIANS which dwell in those partes of PELOPONNESUS, doe call the eyes, optiles. There opilleside.

C are other writers (as Dioscorides for one) which saye Lycurgus had a blowe with a staffe, but he had not his eye striken out with it: and how contrariwise, he founded this temple to Minerua, to give her thanckes for healing of his eye . Hereof it came , that ever fince the SPARTANS haue bene restrayned to carie staues in any assembly of counsell. But to returne to their common repastes, which the CRETANS called Andria, and the LACED EMONIANS Phiditia, Andria and either bicause they were places wherein they learned to line soberly and straightly (for in the media whyse GREKE tongue Phido, is to faue and spare) or els bicause their amitie and friendshippe grewe called. there towards one another, as if they would have called them Philitia, feasts of love, by chaun-

They fat in their halles by fifteene ina D companie, little more or leffe, and at the beginning of euery moneth euery one brought a bushell of meale, eight gallons of wine, five pound of cheese, and two pound and a halfe of figges for a man, besides some litle portion of their monye to buye certaine freshe acates. And ouer and aboue all this, every man when he dyd facrifice in his house, was bounde to send the best and chiefest things of his sacrifice to the halles to be eaten. Likewise if any man went an hunting, and killed any venison: it was an order, he should send a pece of the slesshe thither. Hauing these two lawfull causes, they might eate and drinke by them selues at home, either when they facrificed any beaft to the goddes, or when they came late home from hunting: other-thing. This order they kept very straightly a great time: in so muche as king Agis on a daye, F returning from the warres, where he had ouerthrowen the ATHENIANS, and being defirous to suppe at home privately with the Queene his wife, he sent to the halles for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certaine officers affifting the Kings in the warres, dyd denye him. The next daye Agis left of for spight, to doe the accustomed facrifice they were wont to celebrate in the ende of euery warre: whereupon they fet a fine on his head, and condethned him to paye it. The young children also went to these repasts, euen as they should goe to children were schooles to learne grauity and temperature, where they heard wife and graue discourses brought to touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of masters that were as hierlinges. these mealer. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the first King of that name, sayed once: who supping on a time in the cittle of CORINTHE, and seeing the roose of the hall where he satte, sumptuously embowed and carued, he asked straight if the trees dyd growe carued so in that countrie. The F third lawe was, he dyd forbyd them to make warre often with one enemie, left the enemie forced to take often armes in hande, might in the ende growe experter and vallianter then

And it was ever an ordinarie among them, that the eldest of the companie tolde the rest that A were come into the hall to meale, with shewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a worde here out of this dore. Euen so he that would be recevued to meale there in their of them tooke a litle balle of branne or dowe to wathe their handes with, and without euer a word speaking, they threwe it into a basen, which the servant that waited on them at the table dyd carievpon his head: he that was contented the other should be receyued in companie, dyd cast in his balle as he dyd recevue ir, but if he misliked him, then he pressed it star betwene his fingers, and threwe it in. This ball of branne thus pressed flat, was a smuch as a beane bored thorough, and was to them a figne of condemnation. If any one balle were found of this forte, the futer was rejected: for they would not have any enter into their companie, that was not B liked of all the rest. He that thus was rejected, they saye he was discadded : for the basin wherein the litle balles were caried, was called Caddos. The best dishe they served at these meales, was that they call their blacke brothe: so that when they had that, the olde men dyd eate no fleshe, but leste it all to the younge men, and they by them selues dyd eate the brothe. There was a king of Pont vs, that being defirous to tafte of this blacke broth, dyd buye of purpofe a LACED EMONIAN cooke: but after he had once tasted thereof, he was very angry straight. The cooke then fayed vnto him: and it please your grace, ere one shall finde this brothe good, he must be washed first in the river of Eurotas. After they had eate and drunckethus soberly to-Dion fin the gether, enery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to goe this ther, nor any where els with light, bicause they should accustome them selues boldely to goe C vp and downe the darcke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is specially to be noted, that Lyeurgus would in no wise haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expressely set downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes should be written. For he thought that which should chiefly make a cittie happie, and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens heartes and manners, as to have continuaunce for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre stronger knot to tve men with, then any other compulfary lawe. Which when men by vse and custome through good education doe take in their childhoode, it maketh euery man to be a lawe to him felfe.

fometime are chaunged in one forte, and sometime in another, as occasion serueth: he thought D it best not to constrayne them to doe it by writing, nor to establishe customes that might not be altered, but rather to leave them to the libertie and discretion of men which had bene brought up in the same, bothe to take awaye, and to adde therein, as the case and time should require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefest pointe of a good lawe maker or reformer of the common weale was, to cause men to be well brought vp and instructed. One of his ordinaunces therefore was expressely, that not one of his lawes should be written. Another of his deuises was, against superfluous charges and expences: which to auoyde, he made a lawe that l'all roofes of houses should be made only with the axe, and all gates and doores with the sawe,

For bu making often warres with the countrie of Bon or IA, he made the THEBANS in the ende as expert and valliant fouldiers, as the LACED & MONIANS. Whereupon Antaleidas feeing him hurte one daye, fayed vnto him: The THEBANS have nobely rewarded thee for their learning, fith thou hast made them expert soldiers viwilling to learne the discipline of warte.

Nowe the education of children , he esteemed the chiefest and greatest matter, that a reformer of lawes should establishe. Therefore beginning a farre of the first considered the state of mariage, and the generation of children. For Aristotle fayeth, that Lycurgus dyd attempt to reforme women, and dyd soone gene it ouer B againe: bicause he could doe no good therein, by reason of the great libertie they had taken by the absence of their husbands in the warres, compelled often so to be abroade, and that they dyd leave them mistresses of their house, and at their returne dyd honour them so muche, and make of them so beyonde measure, with calling them ladves and mistresses. Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, as well as he had of mens: and so reason dyd require. To whom by the wave they gave many times prety mockes of purpole, as pleafauntly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their dueties: and sometimes also in their songe for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they prayled them which had deserved it. By this meanes, they dyd set young mens hartes a fire, to striue to winne most prayse and honour. For who so was praysed of them for a valliant man, or whose worthy actes were songe by them, he thereby was incoraged to doe the better another time: and the pretie girdes and quippes they gaue to others, D was of no leffe force, then the sharpest wordes and admonitions that otherwise could be geuen them. This tooke place the rather, bicause it was done in the presence of the Kings, the Senatours, & all the rest of the cittizens which came thither to see these sportes. And though the may des dyd shewe them selves thus naked openly, yet was there no dishonesty seene nor offred, but all this sporte was full of playe and toyes, without any youthfull parte or wantonnes: and rather carried a shewe of demurenes, and a desire to have their best made bodyes seene and foved. Moreover, it fomewhat lifted up their hartes, and made them noblier minded by geuing them to viderstand, that it was no lesse comely for them, in their kynde and exercises to carie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exercises to carie the price. Hereof it came, that the women of LACED EMONWERE So bolde to saye, and thincke of them selves E that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one daye aunswered : being in talke with a straunge woman that faved to her. There be no women in the worlde that commaund their . . .

Furthermore, these playes, sportes, and a Laton daunses, the maydes dyd naked before younge men, were prouocations to drawe and allure woman. the young men to marye not as perfuaded by geometricall reasons, as saveth Plato, but brought to it by liking, and of very loue. Those which would not marye, he made infamous by lawe. For it was not lawfull for suche to be present, where these open games and pastimes Men that were shewed naked. Furthermore, the officers of the cittie compelled suche as would not would not marye, euen in the hardest time of the winter, to enuironne the place of these sportes, and maye, Lycus-

old maried men viually received. Therefore there was no man that milliked, or reproved that, A which was spoken to Dereillidas: albeit otherwise he was a noble captaine. For comming into a presence, there was a young man which would not vowchesafe to rise & doe him reuerence, nor to geue him place for to fit downe: & worthely, o he, bicause thou hast not gotten a sonne, who maye doe so muche for me in time to come. Those which were desirous to marie any, were driven to take them awaye by force whom they would marie, not litle younge wenches I meane, which were not of age to be maried: but luftie & strong maides of age to beare children. And when one of them was stolen awaye in this forte, she that was privile thereto, and meane to make the mariage, came and shaued the heares of her head that was maried: then she put her into mans apparell, & gaue her all things sute like to the same, and layed her vpon a matteresse all alone, without light or candell. After this was done, the bridegroome, being B neither droncke nor finelier apparrelled then he was wonte to be, but having supped soberly at his ordinarie, came home fecretly to the house where the bride was : and there vntied his wiues girdell tooke her in his armes, laved her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards faver & foftely stole awaye to the place, where he was wonte to sleepe with other young men. And so from thenceforth, he continued allwayes to doe the like, being all the daye time, and fleeping most of the night, with his companions, onles he sometime stale to see his wife, being affrayed, and ashamed euer to be seene, by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his younge wife did helpe for her parte, to fpye meanes and occasions howe they might mete together, and not be seene. This manner endured a great while, and vntill somme of them had children, before they boldely met together, and fawe eache other on the daye C time. This fecret meeting in this force did ferue to good purposes, not only bicause it was some meane of continencie and shamefastnes, but also it kept their bodies in strength and better state, to bring forth children. It continued also in both parties, a still burning loue, and a newe defire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor wearie, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as muche as they luft: but they ever parted with an appetite one from another, keeping still a longing defire to deuile howe to mete againe. Nowe when he had stablished suche a continencie, and so kynde a framed honestic in mariage, he tooke no lesse care to drive awaye all soolishe iealousietherein, thin-Lycurgus re- king it very good reach n to beware there should be no violence, nor confusion in mariage: and yet as reason would, they should suffer those which were worthie to get children as it D were in common, laughing at the mad follie of them which reuenge such things with warre and bloudshed, as though in that case men in no wise should have no fellowshippe together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being stepped in yeres, and having a young wife, if feeing a fayer young man that liked him, and knowen with all to be of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with childe, and afterwardes would auowe it for his, as if him selfe had gotten it. It was lawfull also for an honest man that loued another mans wife, for that he sawe her wise, shamefast, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreate her husband to suffer him to lye with her, and that he might also plowe in that lustie grounde, and cast abroade the feede of well fauored children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloude and parentage, with the most honorable and honestest persones. For first of all, Lycur- E ew did not like that children should be private to any men, but that they should be common to the common weale: by which reason he would also, that such as should become cittizens, should not be begotten of euery man, but of the most honestest men only . So Lycurque thought also there were many foolishe vaine toyes and fansies, in the lawes and orders of other nations, touching mariage: feeing they caused their bitches and mares to be limed and couered with the fayrest dogges and goodliest stalons that might be gotten, praying or paying the masters and owners of the same: and kept their wives notwithstanding shut vp safe vnder locke and key, for feare least other then them selues might get them with childe, although they were fickely, feeble brayned, and extreme olde. As if it were not first of all, and chiefly a discommoditie to the fathers and mothers, and likewise to those that bring them vp, to have F unperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of drie and withered men: and then to the contrarie, what pleasure and benefit is it to those that have fayer and good children.

A borne, as gotten of like feede and men. These things were done then by naturall and civill reason, neuertheles they saye women were so farre of then from intreatie, as euer they were before: fo as in olde time, in SPARTA,men knew not what adulterie ment. For proofe where: No adultite of the aunswer made by Geradus (one of the first auncient SPARTANS) vnto a straunger, maye Souria be alledged: that asked him, what punishement they had for adulterers. My friend, to he, there be none here . But if there were ? replied the straunger againe . Marye fayed he, then he must paye as great a bull, as standing vpon the toppe of the mountaine Taygetus, mave drincke in the river of Eurotas. Yea marye: but howe is it possible (to the straunger) to finde such a bull? Geradas laughing, aunswered him againe. And howe were it possible also to finde an adultererin Sparta? And this is that which is found of Lyeurgus lawes touching mariages. Contrariwife, if they founde him deformed, miss hapen, or leane, or pale, they fenthim to be throwen in a deepe pyt of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, and as a man Abothetes would fave, the common house of office: holding opinion it was neither good for the childe, nor yet for the common weale, that it should live, considering from his birthe he was not well made, nor geuen to bestronge, healthfull, nor lustie of bodie all his life longe. For this cause C therefore, the nurce after their birthe did not washe them with water simply (as they doe euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they prooue, whe- Tourne babes ther the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they suppose, that waste with children which are geuen to haue the falling ficknes, or otherwife to be full of rewmes & fickneffes, cannot abide washing with wine, but rather drye and pyne awaye: as contrarilie the other which are healthfull, become thereby the stronger and the lustier. The nurces also of The Somain SPARTAVE a certaine manner to bring up their children, without swadling, or binding them nuree, vp in clothes with fwadling bandes, or having on their heades any croffe clothes: fo as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better shaped and goodlier of bodie. Besides that, they acquainted their children to all kinde of meates, and brought them vp without muche ten-D daunce, so as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be lefte alone in the darcke. neither were they criers, wrallers, or vnhappy children, which be all tokens of base and cowardly natures. So that there were straungers, that of purpose bought nources out of La-CONIA, to bring up their children: as they faye Amyela was one of them, which nourced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwardes a bonde man called Zopyrus, to be Plino of the his mafter and gouernour: who had no better propertie in him, then other common flaues. fift Ale This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and government of the children of SPARTA, into the handes of hyered masters or slaves bought with money: neither was it lawfull for the father him felfe to bring vp his owne childe after his owne manner and liking . For fo foone as they came to feuen veres of age, he tooke and divided them by compa- Howe the Lanies, to make them to be brought up together, and to accustome them to playe, to learne; and children are tostudie one with another. Then he chose out of enery company one, whom he thought brought ve. to have the best wit, and had most courage in him to fight: to whom he gaue the charge and ouerfight of his owne companie. The reste had their eyes waiting allwayes on him, they did obey his commaundementes willingly, they did abide paciently all corrections he gaue them, they did suche taskes and worckes as he appointed them; so that all their ftudie was most to learne to obey. Furthermore, the olde graye headed men were present many times to see them playe, and for the most parte they gaue them occasions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better knowe and difcerne the naturall disposition of every one of them, and whether they gave any fignes or F tokens in time to come, to become cowardesor valliant men . Touching learning, they had as muche as serued their turne: for the reste of their time they spent in learning howe to obey, to awaye with payne, to indure labour, to ouercome still in fight. According to their

LYCVRGVS. groweth and veres, they dyd channel the exercises of their bodyes: they dyd shaue their A heads, they went barelegged, they were constrained to playe naked together the most parte of their time. After they were past twelue yeres of age, they ware no lenger coates: and they gaue them yerely but one feely gowne. This was the cause they were alwayes so nasty & sluttishe,& they neuer vsed to bathe or noynte them selues, sauing only at certained ayes in the yere, when they were suffered to tast of this refreshing. They lave and slept together vpon beddes of straw. which they themselues dyd make, of the toppes of reedes or canes that grewe in the river of Eurotas: which they were forced to goe gather and breake them felues with their handes. It is a kinde without any toole or iron at all. In the winter, they dyd mingle thiftle downe with these, which is called Lycophonas, bicause that stuffe seemeth somewhat warme of it selfe. About this time. to Arthur the fauorers and likers of this prety youthe, which were commonly the luftieft and best dispo- B fed youthes of the cittie, beganne to be ofter in their companie; and then the olde men tooke the better regarde vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daylie exer-cifes,& where their vse was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should mocke another. This dyd their olde men, not by waye of pastime only, but with suche care and harty loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, masters, & gouernours, while they were boyes: in so much as there was never time nor place, where they had not allwayes some to admonishe, reproue, or correct them, if they dyd a faulte. Notwithstanding all this, there was euer one of the honestest men of the cittie, who had expressely the charge and gouernaunce of these boyes. He dyd diuide them in companies, and afterwards gaue the ouer-

fight of them, to suche a one of the boyes as was discreetest, the manliest, the most hardie, and C of the best corage amongest them. They called the children that were past infancie two yeres, Irenes: and the greatest boyes Melirenes: as who would save, ready to goe out of boyerie. This bove who was made ouerseer of them, was commonly twenty yeres of age. He was their cap-Melirenes. taine when they fought, and did commaunde them as his feruaunts when they were in the house: and willed them which were strongest, and the most growen, to carie wodde when they should prepare dinner or supper, and those which were least and weakest, to goe gather erbes, which they must steale or lacke them. So they went out to steale some in gardens, some The theene- at the markets, other in the halles where the feaftes were kept, and men did eate together, invie of the La- to the which they conneyed them selues as closely and cunningly as they could denise: for if cedamoniana, they were taken with the manner, they were scourged terriblie, bicause they were so grosse and D necligent, and not fine and cunning in their facultie. They stole also all other kinde of meate, whatfoeuer they could get or laye hands on. They pried and fought all occasions howe to take and steale meate handsomely, bothe when men were a sleepe, or els that they were careles, or did not geue good hede vnto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundely, and was punished with fasting besides: for they had but a slender pittaunce, bicause neceffity should drive them to venter boldely, and wit should finde out all the deuises to steale finely. This was the chiefest cause, why they gaue them so small a diet. The seconde cause was, that their bodies might growe vp higher in height. For the vitall spirites not being occu-, pied to concoct and difgest much meate, nor yet kept downe, or spread abroade by the quantitie or ouerburden thereof, doe enlarge them selues into lengthe, and shoote up for their light- E nes: and for this reason they thought the bodie did growe in height and lengthe, having nothing to let, or hinder the rifing of the fame. It feemeth, that the fame felfe cause made them faverer also. For the bodies that are leane and flender, doe better and more easely yeld to nature, which bringeth a better proportion and forme to euery member: and contrariwife it feemeth these groffe, corpulent, and overfedde bodies doe encounter nature, and be not so nimble and pliant to her, by reason of their heavy substaunce. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a litle before their time, and be formwhat cast before they should haue bene borne, be smaller and fayerer also, and more pure commonly then other that goe their time: bicause the matter whereof the bodie is formed, being more supple and pliant, is the easelier welded by nature, which geneth them their shape and forme. Touching the na- F turall cause of this effect, let vs gene place to other to dispute it that will, without our further deciding of the fame . But to returne to the matter of the LACED & MONIANS children.

A They dyd robbe with fo great care, and feare to be discouered: that they tell of one, which hauing ftolen a litle foxe, dyd hyde him vnder his cloke, and fuffered him with his teethe and clawes to teare out all his bellie, and neuer cryed, for feare he should haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he stoode. This is not vncredible, by that we see younge boyes doe abide at this daye: for we have feene divers, which have bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, surnamed Orthia. Nowe this vnder master, who had the charge of euery companie of these boyes, vied after supper (fitting yet at the table) to byd childrens exone of them finge a fonge: to another he put forth a question, who was to be well aduised of existe after his aunswer, as for example: Who is the honestest man in the cittie? or howe thinckest thou their support, by that fuch a one dyd? By this exercise they were enured from boyes state, to judge of things R well or ill done, and to vinderstand the life and gouernment of their cittizens. For which of them dyd not aunswer quickly and directly to these questions, who is a good man, who is an honest cittizen, and who not: they thought it was a figne of a dulle wir, and careles nature, not geuen to any vertue, for desire of honour and estimation. Furthermore this vnder master was euer to waite for his aunswer, and to see it should be brief and well knyt vp in wordes: otherwise his punishement that aunswered crossely, or to litle purpose, was that his master byt him by the thumbe. This he dyd many times in the presence of the olde men and magistrates of the cittie, that they might fee whether he punished them with reason or not, and according to their deseruing. And though he dyd hurte him, they dyd not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone awaye, then was he him felfe rebuked and punished, if he had C corrected them to fore, or contrarylie had fauored them to muche. Moreouer they dydascribe the good or ill opinion conceaued of the children, vnto euery of their fauorers, and louers, which dyd affect and entertaine them: in a fmuch as they fave, a young boyevpon a time fighting with another, and a crye scaping out of his mouthe, which his fainte cowardly harte dyd yelde, his fauorer & louer was straight condemned by the officers of the cittie to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the most honest and vertuousest women loued the young maydes thus also: yet was there no icalousie nor suspition that grewe The Lacedzhereof, but rather to the contrarie, there grewe a maruelous mutuall loue and kyndnes be-monial mantweene them, which loued in one selfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, need louing. dyddeuisehowe to make the childe they loued in common, the wifest, the gentlest, and the speache had euer init a pleasaunt grace, and in sewe wordes comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great masse and weight of iron money, should be but litle worthe, and of a simall value, as we have toldeyou before: and contrarilie, that speache in fewe wordes, without any affectation, should holde much deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being Short speache acquainted, after long filence, should be brief and pitthie in their aunswers. For as the seede of the Lacidaincontinent men which are to busie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote moniant. to bringe forth fruite: euen so immoderate speache, full of wordes and busie tattle, bringeth forthas litle sense. Hereof it commeth, that the aunswers of the LACONIANS were so shorte

& witty. As they saye, king Agis aunswered on a daye an ATHENIAN, who iesting at the swords E the LACED & MONIANS dyd were, sayed they were so shorte, that these tumblers, and jugglers dyd swallowe them downe in the fight of all the world: and yet sayed Agis, we hurte our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of speaking: which is not to speake much, but when they speake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderstand them. I thincke also, that Lycurgus selfe, was shorte and quicke in histalke. For so a man maye coniecture by his aunswers which are written; as that which he made to one who earnestly prayed him to stablishe a popular state in LACEDE- seed. And as that which he spake another time, touching to give a hidding con fightes and frayes, which was that he dyd neuer forbid his cittizens any of them, but those wherein they vie to geue their hande, as you would faye to yeld. We mave coniecture also their manner of speaking, by their wordes in mirthe, which they spake sometimes playing wife: for they dyd neuer vie to speake vaine wordes at randone, but it had alwayes fome fecret meaning in it, which required anothers good observation that would finde it. As D he which was defired to goe heare the nightingall counterfeated naturally: I have (faved he)

They well deserved death, fayed he, that dyd but quenche tyrannie: they should have quite consumed it with fire. And one younger boye to another, promiting to geue him suche hardie cockes of the game, as should ye in the place where they fought. O geue me not those (faid he) which will dye, but those which with fighting will kill others. Another seeing men fir- E ting in coches and litters as they went: godforbid (faid he) that I should ever fit in a chayer, where I could not rife to my elders. Suche were their aunswers & encounters. So that somme had reason which sayed heretosore, to speake LACONIAN like, was to be philosopher like: as you would fave, more to exercife the minde, then the bodye. Befides all this, they dyd fludie to finge well, and to make goodly ditties and fonges. Then they spake most properly and feately. There was in their fongs also a certaine motion, I wote not what, which stirred up the hearers hartes, and dyd kindle defire in them to doe notable feates. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter graue and morall, conteining for the most parte the prayse of those, which were flavne in battell for the defence of their countrie, as being happymen: & a shame to those that live, which for fainte hartes refused so to dye, to leade a miserable and vnfortu- F nate life. Or els they fange howe they were the patternes for time to come, or the right glorie of the worlde, and the true representation of vertuous men: as the songe would best become more then another. And in another letter that was fent, where he discourseth, whether it were requifite to inclose the cittie with walles: he faveth can that cittie be without walles, which is enuironned with men, though it be vncompaffed with stone? Neuertheles it is harde to refolue, whether those letters, and other suche like that are shewed, be to be beleeued, or discredited to be his. But that long speache was much disliked, and reproved among the LACED E-MONIANS, it is manifestly to be seene by the words, which somme amogest them have heretofore aunswered. As king Leonidas sayed one daye, to one that discoursed with him many good things, but out of feafon: friend, thou speakest many good wordes, but to litle purpose. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncle made fo fewe lawes: bicaufe faved R he, to men of fewe wordes, fewe lawes will ferue. And Archidamidas fayed thus to fomme, which reproued Hecateus the Orator, for that being bidden to supper at one of their feafts he spake not a worde all supper time. He who can speake well knoweth also when to speake. And where I haue tolde before, that in their feate and quicke aunswers, commonly there was some prety grace, it may be well seene and knowen by these that followe. Demaratus aunswered a bufie fellowe who troubled him to much with vaine importunate questions, asking him still: who was the honestest man of LACED EMON? even he that is least like thy selfe. And Agis faved to somme which highely prayfed the ELIANS for their vpright judgement, & just dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (9 he) if in fine yeres space the E-LIANS one daye doe good justice? And Theopompus likewife to a straunger, who as desirous C. to thew his affection he bare the LACED EMONIANS, told him how every bodye called him Philolacon (as to fave) a louer of LACED EMON. It were more honestie for thee (fayed he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her cittizens. And Plistonax the sonne of Paulanias, when an Orator of ATHENS fayed the LACED EMONIANS were vulearned, and ignorant: thou fayest true of he, for we only of all the GRECIANS have learned none of your ill conditions.

The third was of children that came after and faved:

And we doe hope as well to passe you all at last, and that the vvorlde shall vvitnes be ere many yeres be past.

To conclude, who nerely will confider the worcks and makings of the LACON poets (wherof some areyet extant) and will marke also the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the sound and measure whereof they marched in arraye, going to charge the enemie: he shall finde, that measure whereor they marched in arraye, going to change of Terpander speaking Terpander of Terpander, and Pindarus, had reason to invite hardynes with musicke. For Terpander speaking Terpander of the Lacide of the LACED & MONIANS, fayeth in a place:

This is that lande where deedes of chewalrie, did florishe most in many a martiall feate: Where musicke made her choise of harmonie, and justice kept her stately royall seate. And Pindarus speaking of them also sayeth:

There: graue aduise is founde in aged braynes: there: vallant youthes are lusty ladds in dede. Which can both singe, and daunce, in court like traines:

vet dant their foes with many a doughty dede.

By which testimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and describeth them to haue loued musicke, and the warrestogether. For as another LACON poet sayeth,

For this cause therefore in all their warres, when they should geue battell, the King dyd first facrifice to the Muses, to put his souldiers in minde (as it should seeme) of the discipline & wifdome of the Muses that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his fouldiers were in the most extreme daunger, the Muses should present them selves before the souldiers eves. to pricke them forward to doe some noble actes of worthy memorie. In their time of warre, they dyd tollerate their young men a litle of their hard & old accustomed life, & suffered them The lange then to trime their heares, to have brave armour, to weare gay apparell, & tooke as great de-bushes and light therein, to feethem gallant, & luftie, as to behold young neying & fnorting horse, desirous heare of the for to fight. And althoughe from the beginning of their youthe, they dyd vie to weare longe E heares: yet were they neuer so carefull to combe & brushe their heades, as when they should to the battell. For when they dyd nointe them selves with sweete oyles, & dyd shed their heare, remembring Lycurgus faying: who was wont to tell them, that heares to them which were faver, dyd make them more faver, & to them that were fowle, they made them more ougly & dredfull. The exercises also of their bodies, were more easie & gentle, & not so hard & straight in their warres, as they were in a peace: & generally, their whole manner of life was not then fo straightly viewed, nor ver controlled. So as they only were the men of the world, to whom How the Lawarres were made a rest from labour, which men ordinarylie doe endure, to make them the conians befitter for the warres. forward. So that it was a maruelous pleasure, & likewise a dredfull sight, to see thewhole battell A marche together in order, at the found of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confounde their ranckes, nor to be difmayde nor amazed themselves, but to goe on quietly & joyfully at the founde of these pipes, to hazard themselves even to death. For it is likely, that such corages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercome with much furie: but rather they haue an affured constancie & valliantnes in good hope, as those which are backed with the affifting fauour of the goddes. The King marching in this order, had allwayes fome about him, which had before time wonne the prifes in games and inftes. And they faye there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great some of money at the games Olympicall, not to prefent him felfe at them: buthe refuled it, liking better with great payne to winne the prife, then for muchemoney to lofe his honour . Whereupon one fayed vnto him, LACONIAN: & what B hast thou gotten nowe, to carie away the prife with so much swet? The LACONIAN aunswered him laughing: I shall fight in the battell, layeth he, before the King. When they had once broken into their enemies, they dyd still fiercely and fiercelier fet vpon them, and dyd neuer cease, vntill their enemies gaue wave and fled: and then they chased and followed them still, vntill fuch time as their ouerthrowe and flight had affured them of the victorie. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, judging it to be no manhod, neither the parte of anoble minde, or of fo wor hye a nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill and hewe in peeces, men fo scattered and out of order, having for saken all the hope of victorie. This fell out not only honorable, but also very profitable for them. For they which were in battell against them. knowing they killed none but suche as resisted stowtely, and howe they dyd let other goe C which fled before them: they found it was more their benefit to flye, then to tarie and abide the strokes. Hipping the sophister sayeth, that Lycurgus himselfe was a very good captaine, & a great fouldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fieldes: & Philostephanus afcribeth to him the deuise to put horsemen in troupes & companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fiftie men at armes was a troupe, whose manner was to put them selves in squadros. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwife, that Lyeurgus was neuer at the warres, & that he made all his lawes and gouernment in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of warres during the playes Olympicall, which they fave he deuised doeth shew in apparaunce that he was a gentle natured man, & one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithstanding (amongest whom Hermippus was one) fave, he was not with Iphitus at the first beginning when he ordeined the D playes Olympicall, but that by chaunce he happened to come thither, paffing by in his iorney only, & that he stayed there to see the games: where he thought he heard the voyce of a man behinde him, faying the maruelled much why he dyd not perfuade his cittizens also to be parteners of this newe deuise: and turning backe to see who it was that spake to him, he sawe no bodye. Whereupon he tooke a conceit that it was a speache from the goddes: & went therefore presently to seeke out Iphitus, with whom he made all the statutes and orders of the feast, which afterwardes were farre more famous, better ordered, & more stately then before, But to returne againe to the LACED & MONIANS: their discipline & order of life continued still, after they were full growen men. For it was not lawfull for any man to line as he lifted, but they were within their cittie, as if they had bene in a campe, where every man knoweth what allowance p he hath to liue with all, & what busines he hath els to doe in his calling. To be shorte, they were all of this minde, that they were not borne to serue them selues, but to serue their countrie. Therfore if they were comaunded nothing els, they went continually to fee what the children dvd, and to teache them somewhat which might profit the common weale, or els they went to learne of those which were their elders. For one of the best and happiest things which Lycurgus euer brought into his cittie, was the great rest and leysure which he made his cittizens keyfore of the to have, only forbidding them that they should not professe any vile or base occupation: and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goodes were nothing profitable nor esteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bonde men by the warres, dyd till their groundes, and yeelded them a certaine reuenue euery yere. And as touching this matter, F they tell of a LACED & MONIAN, who being on a daye at ATHENS where the lawe was pleaded, dyd vnderstand that a cittizen there was condemned for Idlenes, and howe he went home

A to his house very forowfully, accompanied with his friends which were forie for him, & greatly lamentedhis ill happe. The LACED & MONIAN then prayed those which were about him, to Thewe him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman, I have alledged this, to thew how he thought it a vile & feruill thing to exercife any handy craft, or to worke any thing by handetoget money. For futes in lawe, a man mayebe well affured they were banished with the golde & filuer from LACED & MON, confidering now there was no more auarice nor couethe golde & muer from LACEDE MONGOINGERING MONGOINGERING MONGOING WITH BOUND TOURS there, noryet pouertie nor lacke, but equalitie with aboundaunce, & quiet life with for with golde or with golde or brietie. All other times but when they had warres, they followed daunting, feaftes, playes, ban-filter that kets, hunting, or other exercises of bodye, & meetinges to passe the time away. For the younge was bomilioned, men vntill they came to thirtie yeres of age, neuer went into the market to buye any prouision the time in B or things for the house, but dyd their fathers or their friends busines: naye it was a shame for spara. the oldest men, to hawnte the market to often. As to the contrary, it was honorable for them to be present at the shewe place the most parte of the daye, where they diversely exercised their bodyes, & likewise to be at the places of affembly, there to spend time with talking together, & discouring honeftly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffike, or money. For all their talke (for the most parte) was about the praying of some honest thing, or fportingwise to reproue some dishonestie, which alwayes carried with it some gentle lesson or

monition by the waye. For Lycurgus was not fuch a fower man, as they neuer fawe him laughe: but as Sofibius writeth, it was he that first facrificed to the litlegod of laughture, which is at LA-CED EMON, bicause he would mingle their feastes and assemblies with mirthe, as a pleasaunt C sawce to easethe trouble of their strickt and harde life. To be brief, he did accustome his cittizens fo, that they neither would not could line alone, but were in manner as men incorporated The Lucdezens fo, that they neither would not could fine alone, but were in mainer as their incorporated menian fined one with another, and were allwayes in company together, as the bees be about their mafter her privately bee: ftill in a continual loue to ferue their countrie, to winne honour, & to advaunce the com- to them felmonweale. Which affection of theirs is playne & eafely feene to be imprinted in them by certen of their aunswers, as in that which Padaretus sayed on a time, being left out of the election padaretus of the number of the three hundred. Who departus have a being left out of the election padaretus of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his house mery and iocond as some might be, fayed: It did him good to fee there were three hundred founde better in the cittie than him selfe. Pistratidas also being sent ambassadour with certen other to the lieutenants of the king of Persia, the Persian lordes asked him, if they came of their owne defire, or D whether they were sent from the whole state: if we obtaine, sayed he, it is from the state: if we be denied, then we come of our felues . And Argileonida the mother of Brasidas , asked some that went to vilite her after they were returned home to LACED & MON from their ionney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her fonne died like a man, and a worthy Spartan. And they straight did commend him highely, faying there was not left in all LACED & MON fuche a valliant man. She replied vnto them. Saye not fo, my friends, I praye you: for Brasidas was in dede a valliant man, but the country of Laconia hath many moe yet vallianter than he was. Now touching their Senate: Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them . The first that were thereof, The manner were Lycurgus chief ayders & affilters of that erection, as we have declared before: but after- of chooping were Lycurgus chief ayders & affilters of that erection, wards he ordeined, that when any of those first should happen to dye, they should choose in his spans. place the most honest reported man in the cittie, so he were three score yere olde and aboue. This was the nobleft glorie that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and prife, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest among est the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for libertie to speake, foueraine authoritie to gouerne, and princely power ouer the common weale, the honour, the life, and the goodes of the whole cittizens: howbeit the election was made after this forte. The people first affembled in the market place, where therewere some appointed and shut vp thereabout in a house, from where they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assembled, but onely they might heare the noyfe which they made there . For the people by their crye and showte did declare whom they did choose, and whom they did refuse of the competitours, as they wed F to shewetheir liking by the like crye in other things. The competitours were not brought in and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, passed through the middest of the assemblie of the people, and fayed never a worde.

locked vp, had bookes or tables in which they wrote and noted the greatnes of the crye, and showte the people made, as euery competitour passed by, not knowing nor seing who he was, These hidden men did onely set downe in their bookes, the first, the second, the thirde, and so many more, as by showtes and cryes they perceyued dyd passe thus through the assemblie. They noted also in their faid bookes, which of these had the greatest crye and showte of people at their paffing thorough: and him they came and declared to be Senatour chosen. Then done the Se- he wearing a garland of flowers on his head, went to all the temples of the goddes in the cittie to geue thankes, having a great traine of young men following, and prayling of his vertues. There went also with him a maruelous company of women finging songes of his prayse, and howe bleffed he was, that he had lived fovertuously. Then every one of his kinne prepared a B bancket for him athome at their houses, and as he entred the house, they sayed vnto him: The sittie honoreth thee with this bancket. That done, he repayred afterwards to the ordinarie place of their eating, where he dyd in all things as he was accustomed, sauing he was serued nowe at his table with a double allowaunce, whereof he referued the one. After supper, all his kinsewomen ftoode in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: so he called her whom he loued best, and gaue her his allowaunce he had saued, and sayed to her: This was geuen me in token I was this daye rewarded for my vertue: and euen fo I geue it thee for a like token of rewarde for thy vertue. Then was she brought home by all the women there to her house, euen in like forteas he was by the men. Touching burialles, Lycurgus made a wife order: For first of all, to cut of all superstition of burying places, he commaunded they should burie their dead within C the cittie, & that their graues should be round about their temples, that young persones might haue them allwayes in their eyes,& not be affrayed to see a deadbodye, as if to touchea corse, or to passe by their graues, it should defile a man. Then did he forbid them to burie any thing with the corfe, and willed they should only lappe it up in a redde clothe, with oline leaues. It was not lawfull to graue the name of any dead body evpon his graue, but only of fuche a man as died in the warres, or of some holy woman professed into their temples. Furthermore, the The time of time appointed to mourne in, was very shorte. For it lasted not but a eleuen dayes, and on the twelft daye, they must doe sacrifice to Proserpina, and so leave of their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or vnworking in his cittizens: for to all necessarie things which men can not lacke, Lyeurgus loyned euer a certaine emulation of men. As to desire vertue, and to con- D temne vice: and furnished his cittie with many good preceptes and examples, emong which his cittizens being still borne and bred vp, and having the same in every place before their eyes where they went, they came to paffe in time to be framed after the very patterne and Rose allored moulde of vertue it selfe. For this cause he didnot suffer any to travell out of the countrie, or to goeabroad as he would, without speciall licence, for feare least those which trauelled abroad after counts for their pleasure, should bring homestraunge factors and manners, and a corrupt disordered life, which by litle and litle might get waye, and bring an alteration and chaunge of the whole stare. Furthermore, he kept out of Sparta all straungers, except those which had necessarie busines there, or were come thither for some profit to the countrie: northat he was affrayed they should learne some thing whereby to lone vertue, or that they should defire to followe his E facion and manner of gouernment as Thueydides was: but rather fearing they should teache $his\ cittizens\ fome\ naughty\ manners, or\ fome\ ill\ fauored\ vice. For\ it\ multineedes\ be, that\ ftraundard respectively. The property of the property$ gers bring euer straunge and newe deuises with them: which newe deuises bring with them al-To newe opinions: and newe opinions beget newe affections and mindes, that many times are repugnant to the lawe, and to the forme of the common weale established before, as discordes doe many times in an harmonie of mulicke, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he indged it a thing most necessarie, to keepe his cittie free and safe from couterfeating of any straungers manners or facions, that were comonly as persones infected with some contagious ficknes. Nowe in all we have spoken before, even to this place, there is no manner of token or thewe of iniuftice, or lacke of equitie, wherewith fome feme to burden Lycurgus in his lawes: F by faying they were well made, to make men warlicke and valliant, but not to be infte or righteous.But cocerning the lawe they call Cryptia, as much to faye, as their fectet: if it were of Lycargue infilintion, as matrificate fayeth, it might have caried Plate into the like opinion that Mycorgus had of his common weale. This was the lawe: The gouernours which had the charge and outerlight of the young men, at certaine appointed times; dyd chufe but those they thought so have the best discretion, and sent them abroade into the countrie, some one wave, forme another waye, who caried with them daggers, and fome prouision to feedethern. These young men being thus differ fed abroade in the countrie, did hide them felues all the daye close in secret places, and there they laye and tooke their rest: afterwardes when night was come, they went to feeke out the high wayes, and killed the first of the F1 or as that they met. Some The coults times turn in the broade daye, they went into the countrie to kill the ftrongett and flowreft of of the Lacetherixas Thucydides telleth in his history of the warres of PELORONNES V.S, where he saybth. n That a certaine convenient number of the ILOTES were crowned, by a publicke proclama lluer. tion of the SPARTANS: and being infranchefed, for their good fernices they had done the common weale, they were caried to all the temples of the goddes for an bonour . Within a while after, no man knewe what was become of them, being about two thousand in humbers fo that neuer manheard tell neither then nor fince, howe they came to their deathes. Howbert Aristotle aboue albothers sayeth, that the Ephores, so soone as they were placed in their offices, made warres with the Luores, bicause they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardely. For they forced them formings to drincke wine without water out of measure, till they had made them starke drunke. Then they brought them all into their common halles where they did eate, to make their children to beholde C them, and to fee what beaftlines it was for a man to be drunke. Likewise they made them singe fonges, and daunce daunces, whit for honelt men, and fuche as were full of derifion and mockerie, and did forbid them expressely to singe any honest songes. So it is reported, that in the iomey the THEBANS made to LACONIA, many of the ILOTES were taken prisoners thereat. and when they were commaunded to finge the verses of Terpander, or of Aleman, or of Spen. Diadrill don the Laconian, they would not doe it : faying , they durft not finge them for their mafters. "best Wherefore he that first sayed in the countrie of LACED & MONIA, he that is tree is more free. and he that is bonde, is more bonde then in other places: knewe very well the divertitie betweene the libertie and bondage there, and the libertie and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the LACED & MONIAN'S beganne to vie these great outrages and eruelties, long n time after the death of Lycurgus, and specially since the great earthquake that happened at Sparta, at which time the ILOTES role against them with the MESSENIANS, and did great mischief through the countrie, and put the cittie to the greatest distresse and damiger that eser ithad. For I cannot be perfuaded, that ever Lycurgus invented, or inflituted, fo wicked and mifchieuous an acte, as that kynde of ordinaunce was: bicaufe I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and iuftice wee fee he vfed in all his other doings; and was witheffed befides by open oracle from the goddes, for a just and wife man. Furthermore, they lave of him, that when he fawe the chiefest pointes of his government had taken deepe roote; and that the forme of his common weale went on, and was strong enough to mainteine and keepe it felfea foote, like as Plato fayeth, that God reioyced greately after he had made the worlde, Plato in Ti-H and sawe the same turne and moue his first mouing : even so Lytungus taking singular pleasure mas. and delight in his minde, to fee his notable lawes put in vie, and fo well stablished and liked of by experience, fought yet to make them immortall, as neere as he could possible; by any forecast of man, that no after time whatsoeuer, might chaunge or put them downe: To bring this to passe, he caused all the people to assemble, and tolde them he thought his truill policie and ftate of common weale was already sufficiently established, for vertuous and happy life: vet there was one matter behinde of greater importaunce than all the rest, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntillhe had first asked counsell of the oracle of Apollo : And therefore in the meane time they should keepe and observe his lawes and ordinaunces inviolablie, without chaunging, remouing, or flaying any matter therein, whill he were returned from the cittle of the property of the S, and then they should doe that other thing behinde, if the God then so counselled worderful. him. They all promifed him to doeit, and prayed him to make haft to goe on his iorney. Burbe- compili in forche departed, he made the Kings and Senatours sweare first, and consequently all the people after that they would keepe his lawes and ordinaunces without chaunging or aftering any A thing, vntill he did returne againe. This done, he went to the cittle of DELPHES, where fo fone as he arrived, he facrificed in the temple to Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man an happy life. Apollo made him aunswer, his lawes were very good: and that his cittie keping them, thould be the most renowmed of the worlde. Lycurgue caused this oracle to be written, which he fent to SPARTA. After he facrificed to Apollo againe : and then taking leave of his friendes, and of his fonne, he determined to dye, bicause his cittizens should never be released of the other they had made betweene his handes. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hathe ftrength enough to live lenger.

affembled like the bees, which gather together about their King, so soone as they spye him: E they did then so greatly reuerence the good government & instice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which saye, the cittie of LACED EMON could obey well. but not commaunde: and for proofe they alleage wordes of king Theopompus, who auniwered one which fayd, that Sparta was mainteined, bicause the Kings could commaund well. Nave the rather (fayd he) bicause the cittizens can obey well. For men commonly disdaine to obey those, which are not wise in commaunding. So that the faithfull obedience of the subjectes, dependeth much vpon the fufficient commaundement of the wife prince. For he that directeth well, must needes be well obeyed. For like as the arte of a good rider, is to make his horse mes breedesh gentle, and ready at commaundement: euen so the chiefest pointe belonging to a prince, is due obediere. to teach his subjects to obey. Wherefore the LACED & MONIANS procured, that not onely F other people did willingly obey them, but also defired to be ruled, and commaunded by them. For they asked them, neither shippes nor money, nor yet did send them any number of men bringing in great store of golde and siluer from the warres, directly against the lawes and ordi- D uernment of Spart a seemed not to be a pollicy or common weale, but rather a certaine holy place & order of religion. And euen as the Poets fayne, that Hercules went through the world with his clubbe, and Iyons skynne, punishing cruell robbers and vnnaturall tyrannes: so in like case with a little scrowe of parchement, and a poore cape, did the SPARTANS commaund and and yet was olde enough also to dye if he would . Wherefore finding him selfe happy to haue obteined his defire, he willingly pyned him felfe to death, by abstinence, and lacke of meate. For B he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit ever to the common weale, and that the ende of their life should be no more idle, or unprofitable, then the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious actes, to have their death extolled for worthines. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and crowne of his felicitie, after he had made and ordeined fo many good and notable lawes, for the honour and benefit of his countrie: and should be as a seale of confirmation of his lawe. and the continuall preservation of his cittie, considering all his cittizens had sworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceased of his hope, for his cittie was

Kings successours, vntill king Agis, the sonne of Archidamus beganne to reigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor discontinewe any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced broke in king them rather to a more straight and stricktorder: although it seemed at the first that the Ephores Aguinne, by were ordeined, for the maintenaunce & defence of the libertie of the people, whereas in deede they did also strengthen the authoritie of the Kings and Senate. Nowe in the raigne of king Agu, gold and filuer beganne first to creepe in againe to the cittie of SPARTA, by meanes of Ly ander . With money there came in straight couetousnes, and gredines to get and gather. And although Lyfander was not defirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money; yet he brought riches and couetousnes into the countrie, and filled the same with all sinenes, by geue lawes, to all the rest of GRECE, euen with their good liking and consent. And they chafed the tyrannes awaye, which vsurped tyrannicall power ouer any of their citties, and did decide all controversies, and oftentimes pacified their seditions, without sending out one souldier, but only a simple poore ambassadour. At whose commaundement, the people presently of warre to compell them, but onely they fent one cittizen of Spanta to gouerne them, to whom all the other people submitted them selnes, and were holpen by him in their necessitie, as fearing and reuerencing him . In this wifethe Sicilians were holpen by Gyfippus, the CHALCIDIANS by Brasidas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lylander, Callieratides, and by Agefilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of princes, peoples, and Kings, vnto whom they were fent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the cittie of Sparta, as youn the most perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to gotterne a common weale after. To this effect tended the mery worde spoken in iest by Stratontede: Who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their facrifices, and the ELIANS to tende their games: and if they made any faulte therein, the LACBDEMONIANS should be well whipped. That B was merely spoken, and in a selting manner. But Antisthenes (the philosopher and one of So- Antisthenen was merely iponen, and the Theban's growen very hawtie & glorious, after that they had conquered the LACED & MONIANS in the iorney of LEVCTRES: me thinketh fayed he, thele THE- worden RANS here doe like the schoole boyes, which bragge and reioyce when they have a little beaten their mafter. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to have his cittie to commaunde many. But he thought the felicitie of a cittie, as of a prinate man, consisted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, and in the vnitie of the inhabitants thereof. He framed his common wealth to this ende, that his cittizens should be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might mainteine and keepe them selues long in fafetie. The self fame intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in fetting forth their bookes, which they wrote C of the government of common weales: and so had likewise many other great and learned men The founda-which have written of the same matter. Howbeit they only left behinde them wordes, and tion of a comwritten bookes: but Lycurgus contrariwife, left no written bookes nor pamplets, but stablished mon weale, and left behinde him, a royall forme of gouernment, which no man euer before had inuented. nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainely see, a whole cittie liue together, and gouerne it felfe philosophically, according to the true rules and preceptes of perfect wildome: which imagined, that true wiledome was a thing hanging in the aver, and could not visiblie be seene in the worlde. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glorie all those, which euer tooke vpon them to write or stablishe the gouernment of a common weale. And therefore fayeth Aristotle, that after his death they did him leffe honour in LACED EMONIA. D then he had deserved albeit they did him all the honour they possibly could deuise. And yet they buylt a temple for him, and made folemne facrifice to him euery yere, as vitto a god. Diame be More, they faye, that when the ashes of his bodie were brought to STARTA, there fell straight nours to Lylightning vpon his tumbe where they were put: which they had not often feene to happen, to his deals. other men of name after their decease, saving only to the poet Euripides, who dying in MACE DONIA, was buried neere the cittle of ARBTHVSA. The which is some manifest argument for suche as loue the Poet, to laye against those which somewhat depraue him, seing this signe cameto him after his death, which had happened before to a most well beloued man of the goddes. Some faye Lycurgus died in the cittle of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis fayeth, he died in ELIDA, Timeus and Aristoxenus write, he ended his dayes in CRETA. And Aristoxenus E fayeth further, that those of the Ile of CRETA doe shewe his graue in the place which they call Pergamia, by the broade highe wayes fide. He left one onely begotten fonne named Ans Amioria Ly tiorus, who died without iffue, fo that his house and name fayled with him. But his neere kinses men and famillier friendes, did fet vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the dayes wherein they affembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Aristocrates (the sonne of Hipparchus) who sayeth, that he being dead in CRET whis friendes burned his bodie, and afterwardes threwe his ashes into the sea, according as he had prayed and requested them. For he feared, that if any parte of him should at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitans would haue fayed he was returned againe, and thereby would have thought them selves discharged of their othe, and might have lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the discourse and ende of Lycurgus life.

THE LIFE OF Numa Pompilius.

Numa van. Cicero de Or. a. Liu.Halic. lib.2,

V bether Pythagoras had any conmer fation with Numa.

the feconde, Nuna, at

HE Historiographers differ maruelously of the time, in which Name A Pompilius raigned King, albeit some will deriue from him many noble houses desceded in Rome. For one Cloding, who wrote the booke intituled the table of time, affirmeth that the auncient registers of the cittie of Rome were lost when it was taken and facked by the GAVLES: and that those which are extant at this daye be not true, but were only made by men desirous to gratifie some, which have thrust in auncient houses and families of the first ROMAINES, that concerne nothing them whom they ment to represent. On the other side, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familier friend and scholler of Pythagor as the philosopher, yet some saye he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. B And yer mainteining that it is possible enough, that he was so well borne, and had suche perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer neded any mafter: & though he had neded, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this King vnto some other foreane person, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other faye, that Pythagoras the philosopher was long time after the raigne of Numa, & well nighe five ages after him. How beit other faye, there was another Pythagoras borne in SPARTA (who having wonnetheptyle of running at the games Olympicall in the fixtenth Olympiade, & the third yere of Numaes raigne) did come into ITA-LITE, where he kept much about Numa, & did affift & helpe him in the gouerning & ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many customes yet of the LACONIANS, mingled with the Romaines, which this second Pythagoras was sayed to have taught him. Neuer- C theles it is not confessed that Numa was borne of the SABYNES, which they saye are descended from the LACED & MONIANS. So it falleth out very hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for fuche as will followe the rolle or table of those, which from Olympiades to Ólympiades haue wonne the pryles of games Olympicall: confidering the rolle or table that they have at this prefent, was very lately published by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reason or argument of necessitie, why at should be taken for an vindoubted trothe, which he in that forte hath gathered. Yet we will not leave to put in writing those things worA thiz of memorie, which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meetest . It was nowe fithence Rome was buylt feuen and thirtie veres (for fo long time raigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifte of the moneth of July (which The death of they call the Nones of the goates) made a folemne facrifice without the cittie, neere to a cenraine place commonly called, the goate marthe. As all the whole Senate, with the most parter of the people were present at this sacrifice, sodainely there rose in the aver a very great termpeft, and a maruelous darcke thicke clowde, which fell on the earthe with fuche boysterous windes, stormes, lightnings, and thunder: that the poore common people being affrayed of so fore a tempest, dispersed them selues sodainely, running here and there for succour, and therewithall king Romalus vanished awaye in suche sorte, that he was neuer after seeine aline not

B dead. This brought the Senatours, and noble men whom they called Patricians, into great fulpition. And there ranne a fowle tale among the common people, howe they had a long time borne very impaciently to be subjects to a King, bicause them selves would have had and tax ken vpon them fome foueraine authoritie, and that for this cause they had killed king Romulion Adding somewhat more vnto it, howe a little before he had vsed them more roughely, and commanded them more ftraightly then he was wont or accustomed. Neuertheles they found the meanes to quenche all these bruites and murmurings, by doing divine honour and sacrafice vnto him, as one not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirme this, one of the noblest men among them called Proclus came in , and by othe affirmed before all the people , that he me who were fawe Romulus ascending vp into heaven, armed at all peces, and that he heard a voyce fave: Romaldes he C from thenceforth call him Quirinus. This being thus appealed, there fprangevp another trousble, to knowe whom they should choose in his place. For the straungers which were come then from other places to dwell in Rome, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne Diffention at ROMAINES: in so muche, as the common people dyd not only wauer, and stagger vp and Rome about down in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many & of divers nations) did enter into a sheer King. suspition one of another. These things notwithstading they all agreed in this, that of necessitie they must choose a King: howbeit in the rest they differed much, not only whom they should choose, but also of what nation he should be. For those which were the first sounders and buyldersof the cittle of Rome with Romalus, could in no wife abide, nor fuffer, that the SABY NEIS (to whom they had divided parte of their landes, and a moytie of their cittie) (bould attempt

D and prefume to commaund them, whom they dyd receyue and affociate into their company and felowshippe. The SABYNES alledged on thother fide for them, a good reason, and such as caried great probabilitie. Which was, that neuer sence the death of their king Tatino, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted king Romulus, but had suffered him to raigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being nowe deceased, reason would that the newe King should be chosen of their nation. And that albeit the Romaines had received them into their cittie, they could not say therefore, that in time of this association, they were lesse to be reckoned of in any thing, than them selues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increased their might and power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deserved the honour and title of a cittie. These were the causes of their contention. But E to preuent that of this contention there might growe no confusion in the circle if it should remaine without an head to commaund the Senatours which were a hundred and lifticith Linie Careth number, gaue counsell that every one of them by turnes, one after another Ahould carie the but a hun royall state of the King, and all the showes and ornaments of his maiestie, and should does the dred. ordinarie facrifices of the King, and dispatche all causes fixe howers in the days, and fixe 200, howers in the night, as the King before had vied . Thus they thought it beltto daniste the rule, Plutar in the that one might have as much power as the other, as well in respect of them seluces, as also for segarde of the people. For they imagined, that the chaunging and remouning thus of this regall with Dionydignitie, and paffing it from man to man, would clene take awaye enuite among them, attel fundament make enery of them to rule temperately, and vprightly fee, that in one, and the felfe fame days the temperately. F and night, every of them should be a King and private persone also. The Romanian scall keepe themselves from falling into the suspinion, and slaunder of the people; who gaue is out straight, that this was a fine deuise of theirs, to chaunge by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a fewe noble mens handes, to the ende that the whole authoritie and gouernment of all publicke causes, should remaine still in them selues, bicause it grieued them to be fubiect to a King. And in the ende, the two parter of the cittle came to this agreement: that the one parte should choose one of the bodie of the other, to be the King. This course they liked very well, aswell for the pacification of present sturre and dissention amongest them selues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and sturring vp a likenes of goodwill in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen: whereby he should loue the one parte for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other parte for that he was of their nation. The SABYNES were the first, which referred the election to the Romaines choyle : and the Romaines B thought it better to chuse one of the nation of the Sabynes, then to have a Romain E chofen by the SABYNES. After they had consulted, they determined amongest them selues : and Numa chofm did choose Numa Pompilius one of the bodye of the SABYNES to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at Rome, howbeit he was a man so samous for his vertue, that the SABYNES fo foone as they named him, did receyue him more willingly, then they who had chosen him. After they had thus published their election, the first and chiefest persones of the one & the other side, were chosen out to goe vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius News borne was borne in one of the chiefest and best citties which the SABYNES had, called Cures, whereupon the Romaines, and their fellowes the Sabynes, were called afterwardes Quirites, and Quinter why he was the sonne of Pomponius a noble man, the youngest of source brethern: being by the se- C cretworking of the goddes, borne on the very daye, on the which Rome was first founded by Romulus, which was the one and twenty daye of Aprill. This man being naturally geuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increase the same, by studie, and all kynde of good discipline: and by the exercise thereof, and of true pacience, and right philosophie, he did marmoment ueloufly adorne him felfe and his manners. For he did not only clere his foule, and minde, of Nona before all passions and vices commonly red in the worlde: but he conquered in him felse all heares, violence,& couetousnes. And would neither seeke nor vsurpe, that which was an other mans, a thing at that time honoured among the most barbarous people: but thought that to be the true, and right victorie in man, first to conquer and commaund him selfe by judgement & reafon, & then to subdue all couetousnes & greedines. Hauing therfore this opinion, he would in D no wife haue in his house any superfluity or finenes. He became to euery manthat would employe him(aswell straunger as his owne countrie man)a wise confaillour, & an vpright judge. He bestowed his leysure, not to followe his owne delight, or to gather goods together: but to

she goddesse

there to serue & cherishe his olde father with his wife Tatia: who for her parte also liked better, to liue quietly with her husbad being a private ma, then to goe to Rome where the might have lived in much honour and glorie, by meanes of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13, yeres after she was maried. After her deathe, Numa leauing to dwell in the cittie, was better contéted to liue in the country alone, & folitarie, & gaue him felf to walke much in the fields & woddes confectated to the godds, as one defirous to leade alone life, farre from the copanie of men. Wherupon was raifed (in my opinio) that which is spoken of him, & of the goddesse Egeria. That it was not for any straungenes, or melancholines of nature, that Numa withdrew him self from the couerfation & copany of men, but bicause he had found another more honorable & holy fociety of the Nymphe, & goddeffe Egeria, who had done him, as they fave, that honour, astomake him her husbad with who as his beloued darling it is sayed he enjoyed happy dayes, & by dayly frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the loue & knowledge of all ce-F leftiall things. Surely, these deuises are much like vnto certain old fables of the Phrygias, which they having learned from the father to the sonne, doe love to tell of one Atu: of the Bithymians, serue the goddes, & to behold their celestiall nature and power, as much as mans reason & vnderstäding could coprehend. Thereby he got fo great a name & reputation, that Tatius (which was king of Rome with Romulus) having but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his some in law. How beitthis mariage put him in no such iolity, that he would dwel at Rome with his father in lawe, but rather kept at home at his own house in the countrie of the SABYNES,

A of one Herodotus: of the Ancantans, of one Endymion: and of many other fuch like men, who in their littes were taken for fayntes, and beloued of the goddes. Notwithstanding, it is likely that the goddes loue neither birdes, nor horse, but men, and have sometimes a liking to be familliar with perfect goodmen, and doe not disdaine sometime the conversation of suche as be: Goddes fair holyereligious, and denoute. But to believe the goddes have carnall knowledge, and doe de millier with light in the outward beawtie of creatures, that feemeth to carie a very harde beliefe. Yet the wife E GYPTIANS thincke it probable enough and likely, that the spirite of the goddes hath genen originall of generation to women, and doe beget fruite of their bodies: howbeit they holde that a man can haue no corporall companie with any diume nature. Wherein they doe not colider, that every thing that loyneth together, doth deliver againe a like substance, to that B wherewith it was joyned. This notwithstanding, it is mete we should beleeue the godds beare good will to men, and that of it doth fpring their loue, whereby men faye the goddes loue those whose manners they purifie, and inspire with vertue. And they doe not offende, which fayne that Phorbas Hyacinthus and Admetus, were sometimes the louers of Apollo, and also Hippolytus the Sicyonian: of whom they reporte; that euer when he passed ouer the armé of the seas which lieth betweene the citties of Sicyona, and of Cirkha, the god which knewe he came. rejoyced, and caused Pythia the prophetesse to pronounce these heroycall verses.

I knowve full well, my deare Hippolytus. returnes by fea, my minde divineth thus.

It is fayd also that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verses, and that the goddes honored godden C the poets Heliodus, & Archilorus, after their death by the Mules. They fave moreover, that Afculapius laye with Sophocles in his life time, and at this daye they doe yet showe many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honorably buried. Nowe if they graunte, that fuch things maye be true: how can we refuse to beleeve, that some goddes have bene familliar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroastres, Lyeurgus, Numa, and fuch other like personages, which have governed kingdomes, & stablished common weales? and it is not valike that the goddes in deede dyd company with them, to inspire and teache them many notable things, and that they did drawe neere vnto these Poets, & players of the harpe, that made: and played many dolefull and joy full ditties, at the least for their sporte and pleasure onely, if euer they came neere them. Neuertheles if any man be of other opinion, the wave is open and D large as Bacchylides fayed to thincke and faye as he luft. For my felfe I doe finde, that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other fuche persones, not to be without likely hood and probabilitie: who having to governe rude, churlifhe, & stiffe necked people, and purposing to bring in ftraunge nouelties into the gouernments of their countries, did fayne wifely to have conference with the godds, confidering this fayning fell to be profitable & beneficiall to those them felues, whom they made to believe the fame . But to returne to our historie . Numa was fourty veres olde, when the ambaffadours of Rome were fent to prefent the Kingdome vnto him, & to intreate him to accept thereof, Proclus, and Velefus, were the ambaffadours that were fent. One Proclus and of the which the people looked should have bene chosen for King, bicause those of Romulus Vetesiu am-fide, did fauour muche Proclus: and those of Tatius parte fauored Velesus. Nowe they yied no balladours to F. long speache vnto him, bicause they thought he would have bene glad of suche a great good the kingdom. fortune. But contrarely it was in deede a very hardthing & required great perfuafions & much intreatie, to moue a man which had allwayes lived quietly, & at eafe, to accept the regiment of a cittie, which as a man would faye, had bene rayfed vp and growen by warres, and marrially dedes. Wherfore he aunswered them in the presence of his father, and one other of his kinges men called Martius in this forte. Chaunge & alteration of manslife is euer daungerous: but for The oration him that lacketh nothing necessarie, nor hath cause to coplaine of his present state, it is a great of Norma to follie to leave his olde acquainted trade of life, & to enter into another newe and vnknowen, if down very finding there were no other but this only respect that he leaueth a certaintie, to venter woon an vncer- we will be a tainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the daugers & perills of this kingdom which

F they offer me, are not altogether vncertain, if we wil looke backe what happened vnto Romalus: Who was not vnfufpected to haue layed waite, to haue had Tatius his fellow & copanion murdered:& now after Romulus death, the Senatours felues are mistrusted to have killed him on the other fide by treason. And yet they saye it, and singuise ucry where that tomulus was the some of a god, that at his birthe he was miraculously preferued, and afterwardes he was as incrediblie brought vp. Whereas for my owne parte, I doe confesse, I was begonten by a morrall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men as you known and these fewe qualities which they prayle & commend in me, are conditions farre vnancto for a man chat is to raigne, Letter loued a folitarie life, quiet and ftudie, and did exempt myfelfe from worldly causes. All my life time I have fought and loued peace about all things, and never had to doe with any warres. My conuerfation hath bene to companie with men, which meete only to ferue & honour the goddes, or to laughe and be merie one with another, or els to spende their time in their private affayers, or otherwise sometime to attend their pastures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romalin (my Romain E lordes) hath left you many warres begonne, which peraduenture you B could be contented to spare: yet now to mainteine the same, your citie had neede of a martiall King, active, & strong of bodye. Your people moreover, through long custome, and the great increase they are genen vnto by feates of armes, defire nought els perhappes but warres; and it is plainely seene, they seeke still to growe, and commaund their neighbours. So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a mere mockerie for me, to goe to teache a cittie at this prefent to ferue the goddes, to loue inflice, to hate warres, and to flye violence: when it rather hath neede of a conquering captaine, then of a peaceable King. These and suche other like reasons and persuasions Numa alleaged, to discharge him selfe of the Kingdome which they offred him: Howbeit the ambaffadours of the Romain somethumbly belought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he would not be the cause of another newe sturre, and commotion among them, feeing both partes in the cittie haue geuen their confent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreouer, when the ambaffadours had left him vponthis sute, his father, and Martins his kinseman, beganne also privately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good and godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer than he was, nor coueted no princely honour nor glorie, bicause he sought only most famous vertue: yet he must needes thincke, that to rule well, was to doe the goddes good feruice, whose will it was to employe the inflice they knewe in him, and not to fuffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (9 they) this royall dignitie, which to a graue and wife man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable workes and fruites. There you maye doe noble fervice to the godds, to humble the hearres of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious: for they readely turne, and eafely conforme them selues vnto the nature of their prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a ftraunger: they have confecrated a memorie to Romulus with dinine honours, which they make vnto hun at this daye. And it maye be, that the people feeing them selues conquerers, will be full enough of warres: and the ROMAINES being nowe full of spoyles & triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle prince, and one that loueth inftice, that they maye thenceforth liue in peace, under good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hartes be still full of heate and furie to fight; is it not better to turne this their defire to make wartes some other wave, when a man hathe the bridle in his owne handes to doe it, and to be a meane in the meane time to iovne the countrie, and all the nation of the SABYNES, in perpetual loue E and amitie, with fo mighty and florithing a cittie? befides all these persuasions and reasons, there were many fignes also (as they saye) which promised him good lucke, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne countrie cittizens. Who, so soone as they understoode the coming, and commission of the ambassadours of Rome, they importunately desired him to goe thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdome: that he might more straightby write and incorporate them together with the Romaines. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done facrifice to the goddes, he fet forwardes on his jour-Roma begin the Kingdome: Then after he had done facrifice to the goddes, he fet forwardes on his jour-net binking ney towardes Rome: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with a wonderfull defire to fee him. The women at his entrie, went bleffing of him, and finging of his prayles. They dyd facrifice for him, in all the temples of the goddes. There was neither F man nor woman but seemed to be as joyfull and glad: as if a newe Realme, and not a newe Kinge, had bene come to the cittie of Rome. Thus was he brought with this open joye,

A and rejoycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voyces of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignitie of the King. But he him felfe commaunded they should be stayed a while. faving: He must first be confirmed King by the goddes. Then he tooke the wise men & priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which that time was yet called mounte Tarbeian. And there, the chiefest of the soothesayers called Augures, turned him towardes the southe, Numa was having his face covered with a veyle, and stoode behinde him, laying his right hande vpon his confectated heade, and praying to the goddes that it would pleafe them to declare their willes by flying of birdes, or some other token concerning this election; and so the soothesayer cast his eyes all B about, as farre as he could possiblie discerne. During all this time there was a maruelous silence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were affembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the iffue of this divination would be wntill there appeared vnto them on the right hande, good and lucky birdes, which did confirme the eleation. Then Numa putting on his regall robes, came downe from mounte Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receyued him with wonderfull showtes of ioye, as a man themost holy, and best beloued of the goddes that they could have chosen. So having taken $ the royall feate of the Kingdome, his first acte was this. That he discharged the garde of the three hundred fouldiers, which Romulus had allwayes about his persone, called Celeres: saying, The garde of he would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which seleres dis C should mistrust him. His secondacte was, that he did adde to the two priests of Impiter & Mars, Nama. a thirde, in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the auncient Ro- Flamen Qui-MAINES also called their priests, instituted in the olde time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle med of Nunarrowe hattes which they did weare on their heades, as if they had called them Pilamines: for ma. Pilos in Greeke fignifieth a hatte, And at that time (as they faye) there were many moe Greeke wordes mingled with the Latine, then there are at this daye. For they called the mantells the Kings did weare Lanas. And Iuba fayeth that it is the very fame which the GRECIANS call Chlanas, and that the younge boye which was a feruaunte in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS doe yet call the god Mercurie, bicause he is servaunt of the godds. Now Numa having done these things at his first entrie into his Kingdome, still to winne further fauour and goodwill of the people: beganne immediately to frame his cittizens to a Numa inducertaine civilitie, being as iron wrought to foftenes, and brought them from their violent and ceth civil or warlike desires, to temperate and civill manners. For out of doubt, Rome was properly that, quies life. which Plate ascribeth to a cittie full of trouble and pryde. For, first it was founded by the most lib.a. coragious and warlike men of the worlde, which from all partes were gathered there together, in a most desperate boldnes: and afterwards it increased, and grewe strong, by armes and continuall warres, like as pyles driven into the grounde, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and sticke the faster . Wherefore Numa judging it no small nor light enterprise, to plucke downe the hawty stomacks of sofierce and violent a people, and to frame them vnto a fobre and quiet life: dyd feeme to worcke it by meanes of the goddes, with drawing with facrifices, feaftes, dauncings, and common processions, wherein he celebrated euer him felfe. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled nowe and then, pastime and pleasure: and sometimes he layed the terrour and seare of the goddes before their eyes, making them believe that he had feene straunge visions, or that he had heard voyces, by which the goddes dyd threaten them with some great troubles and plagues, allwayes to pull downe and humble their heartes, vnto the feare of the goddes. This was the cause why they thought afterwardes that he had learned his wisdome of Pythagoras the philosopher: bi-

E them on thereto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their whotte and fierce corages to fight, cause the greatest parte of the philosophie of the one, and of the government of the other, consisted in suche ceremonies, and divine studies. They reporte also that Numa dyd put on Numa and F the outwarde showe and semblaunce of Pythagoras holines, as following his intention and Tythagoras example. For Pythagor as as they faye, made an eagle for tame and gentle, that the would floupe, muche a life. and come downe to him by certaine voyces, as the flewe in the ayer over his head. And that passing through the assembly of the games Olympicall, he shewed her thighe of golde, and A many other prety feates and deedes they tell of, which feemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasian hath written these verses of him:

Pythagoras wwhich loued to dwell in dignitie. and had an harte to glorie bent and past in pollecie. Muche like a man vuhich fought, by charming to enchaunte, did vee this arte to vvinne mens mindes which unto him did haunte. His grave and pleafaunt tongue in sugred speache did flouve.

vuhereby he drevve most mindes of men to bent of his ovune bovve. Euen so the fayned fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the love of a goddesse, or some Nymphe of the mountaine: with whom he seemed to have certaine secret B meetings and talke, whereof we have spoken before. And it is sayed he muche frequented the Muses in the wooddes. For he would saye, he had the most parte of his reuelations of the Muses, and he taught the Romaines to reverence one of them about all the rest, who was called Tacita, as ye would faye, ladye filence. It feemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did so specially commaund, and recomend silence vnto his schollers. Againe, if we feeing we cannot possibly any waye attaine to the knowledge of god, but in minde and vnder-

manner of seruing of the goddes, which the Pythagorians vsed . For in their sacrifices they spilt Pythazoras alltogether agreable vn the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that god was neither sensaught his fible, nor mortall, but inuifible, incorruptible, and only intelligible. And Numa dyd forbid the Schollers to ROMAINES also to beleeve, that god had ever forme, or likenes of beast or man. So that in keşe filence. Prohagoras those former times, there was in Rome no image of god, either painted or grauen: and it was C opinion of from the beginning a hundred three score & tenne yeres, that they had buylt temples & chap-Norma firbad pels vnto the godds in Rome, and yet there was neither picture nor image of god within them. For they tooke it at the first for a facriledge, to present heauenly things by earthely formes:

not the bloude, but they did theirs commonly, with a litle meale, a litle sheading of wine and milke, and with suche other light things. Suche as affirme that those two mendid much company and were famillier together, doe laye further proofes & arguments for the same. The first Proofes for the connersa- is this: That the Romaines did make Pythagoras a free man of the cittle of Rome, as Epichar- D mus the Comicall poet an auncient writer (and sometimes one of Pythagoras schollers) sayeth in a booke he wrote & dedicated vnto Antenor. The other proofe is: That Numa having had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagor as sonnes name, from whom they faye is discended, the house of the Emylians, which is the noblest of the Patricians: for the King gaue him the furname of Amylius, bicause of his sweete tongue and pleasaunt voyce. man that euer was amongest the GRECIAN s: caused two statues of brasse to be set vp in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, and the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to striue about this matter any further, seeing there are so many doubtes: me thincketh it were but vaine. Moreo- E Numa infii. uer, they attribute to Numa, the first erection of the colledge pontificall: and saye he him selfe was the first Pontifex that euer was . But touching the name of Pontifex, some will saye they were so called, bicause they chiefly were ordeined & appointed for the service of the almighwhy so called, tie: for this worde Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mightie. Other thincke this name was genen to them by their founders, as to exempt persones out of the worlde: who enioyned them to doe all the feruice and facrifices to the goddes they could poffibly, & yet notwithstanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most parte doe bring out another derivation of this name, wherein me thinckes there is litle reason. As that they should be called Pontifices, bicause they had the charge of maintenaunce of the bridge. For that which the GRE- F CIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to saye truely, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the bishoppes: aswell as the keeping of the most holy oracle, which commaunded them to fet vp images in their cittie, to the wifest and valliantest

A and vnchaungeable ceremonies. For the ROMAINES thought it not only a thing vnlawfull, but tooke it for a most damnable & wicked acte, to destroye or breake the bridge of wodde, which was only joyned together (as they faye) with pinnes of worde, & without any iron at all, by the commaundement of an olde oracle. But the stone bridge was buylt long time after the raigne of Numa, and in the time of the raigne of his nephewe Martius. Nowethe first and chiefest of these bithoppes, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the highe prieste and master, of their pontificall lawe: who should be carefull, not only about The highe all publicke sacrifices and ceremonies, but also about suche as were private, and to see that no bishoppe. man prinately should breake the auncient ceremonies, norbring in any newe thing into religion, but rather every man should be taught by him, how, and after what forte he should serve R and honour the goddes. He also hath the keping of the holy virgines which they call Vestales. For they doe geue Numa the first foundation and consecrating of them, and the institutional- The institutionalto of keeping the immortall fire with honour and reuerence, which these virgines haue the tien of the charge of Either for that he thought it meete to commit the substaunce of fire (being pure net. and cleane) vnto the custodie of cleane and vncorrupt maydes: or els bicause he thought the The holy and nature of fire (which is barren, and bringeth forth nothing) was fittelt, and most proper vnto immersal fire. virgines. For in GRECE, where they kept continuall fire likewife (as in the temple of spollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the maydens doe not keepe the same, but olde women which are past mariage. And if this fire chaunce to faile, as they saye in ATHENS the holy lampe was put out in the time of the tyrannie of Aristion: and in the cittie of DELPHES it was put out, C when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME also, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINES had against king Mithridates: and in the time of the civil warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and confumed together: they fave that it must not be lighted againe with other common fire, but must be made a newe, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the funne, and that they doe in this manner. They have a hollowe How the halp veffell made of a pece of a triangle, having a corner right, and two fides a like: fo that from all free drawen partes of his compasse and circumference, it falleth into one pointe. Then they set this vessels from the part right against the beames of the sunne, so that the bright sunne beames come to assemble and funne. gather together in the center of this vessell, where they doe pearce the aver so strongely, that they fet it a fire: & when they put to it any drye matter or substaunce, the fire taketh it straight, D bicause the beame of the sunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drye matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thincke that these Vestall virgines keepe no other thing, but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other fave, there are other holy thinges also, which no bodie maye lawfully fee but they; whereof we have written more largely in the life of Camillus, at See the life of the least so much as maye be learned and tolde. The first maydens which were vowed and put camillus toninto this order of religion by Numa, were (as they faye) Gegania, and Verenia: and after them, fall Numes, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwardesking Seruius increased the number with two other, and that number of four econtinueth vntill this daye. Their rule and order fet downe by king Numa was Theorder asthis: that they should vowe chastitie for the space of thirtie yeres. In the first tenne yeres they pointed the learne what they have to doe: the next tenne yeres following, they doe that which they have Numa. E learned: & the last tenne yeres, they teache young nouices. After they have passed their thirtie yeres, they maye lawfully marie if they be disposed, and take them to another manner of life, and leave their religion. But as it is reported, there have benevery fewe of them which have taken this libertie, and fewer also which have joyed after they were professed, but rather have repented them selues, and lived ever after a very grieuous and sorowfull life. This did so frave the other Vestalls, that they were better contented with their vowed chastitie: and so remained virgines, vntill they were olde, or els died. He gaue them also great priviledges, and prerogatives. As: to make their will and testament, in their fathers life time. To doe all things without any gardian or ouerfeer, as women which have three children at a birth. When they programme goe abroade, they carie maces before them to honour them. And if by chaunce they meete they them selues doe any faulte, they are corrected by the great by shoppe, who somtimes doth A whippe them naked (according to the nature and qualitie of their offence) in a darcke place, & vnder a curté. But the that hath deflowred her virginity, is buried quicke by one of the gates of the cittie, which they call Collina gate: where within the cittie there is a mount of earth of a good length, & with the LATINES is fayed to be raifed. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollowe vawte, and leaue a hole open, whereby one maye goe downe: and with in it there is fet a litle bed, a burning lampe, and some vitells to susteine life withall. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honours fake: to the ende they would not be thought to familhe a bodie to deathe, which had bene confectated by the most holy and deuoute ceremonies of the worlde. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter. which they couer strongely, and close it vp with thicke leather in suche sorte, that no bodie B canne so much as heare her voyce, & so they carie her thus shut vp through the market place. Euery one draweth backe, when they fee this litter a farre of, and doe gene it place to paffe by: & then follow it mourningly, with heavy lookes, & speake neuer a word. They doe nothing in the citie more fearefull to behold, then this: neither is there any daye wherein the people are more forowful, then on fuch a daye. Then after the is come to the place of this vawte, the fergeants straight vnlose these fast bounde couerings: and the chiefe byshoppe after he hath made certen fecret prayers vnto the godds, and lift his handes vp to heaven, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Vestall mussled vp close, and so putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyeth her downe into the vawte. That done, he withdraweth, and all the prieftes with him: and when the feely offendour is gone downe, they straight plucke vp the ladder, & cast aboun- C daunce of earthein at the open hole, so that they fill it vp to the very toppe of the arche. And this is the punishment of the Vestalls which defile their virginitie. They thincke also it was Numa that buylt the round temple of the goddesse Vesta, in which is kept the everlasting fire: meaning to represent not the forme of the earth, which they saye is Vesta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middeft whereof (according to the Pythagorians opinion) remaineth the proper seate and abiding place of fire, which they call Vesta, and name it the vnitie. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmoueable, not yet that it is fet in the middest of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it : but faye to the contratie, that the earth hanged in the ayer about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they graunte, that the earth is one of the first and chiefest partes of the world: as Plate helde opinion in that age, that the D earthe was in another place then in the very middest, and that the center of the world, as the most honorablest place, did apperteine to some other of more worthy substaunce than the earthe. Furthermore, the bythoppes office was to show those that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and customes of buriall: whom Numa taught not to believe that there was any corruption or dishonesty in burialles, but rather it was to worshippe & honour the godds of the earthe, with viual and honorable ceremonies, as those which after their death recevue the chiefest service of vs that they canne. But about all other in burialles, they did specially honour the goddeffe called Libitina, that is fayed, the chiefe gouernour and preserver of the rites of the dead: or be it Proserpina, or Venus, as the most learned men among the Ro-MAINES doe judge, who not without cause doe attribute the order of the beginning and ende of mans life, to one self god, & power divine. Numa ordained also, how long time every bodie should mourne in blackes. And for a childe from three yeres to tenne yeres of age, that died: he ordeined they should mourne no more monethes then it had lived yeres, and not to adde a daye more. For he commaunded that the longest time of mourning should be but then moneths onely, and so long time at the least he willed women should remaine widdowes, after the decease of their husbands: or els she that would marie within that time, was bounde by his order to facrifice awhole bullocke. Numa also erected many other orders of priestes: of Sali, Feciales. two forces whereof I will only make mention. The one shalbe the order of the Salii, and 62. Gell lib. the other of the Feciales: for me thinckes, both the one and the other doth manifestly showe the great holines, and fingular denotion which he had in him. The F ECIALES are F Feciales calproperly those, which the GRECIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would saye, peacekeepers. And in my judgement, they had their right name according to their office, bicause they

A did pacific quarells with reason by waye of order, and did not suffer (as much as in them laye) that any matter should be tried by violence, vntill they were past all hope of any peace. For the GRECIANS call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controuersie Irenen: a with reason, and not with sworde. Euen so those which the Romaines called the Fectales, diffed with went many times in persone to those that dyd the Romaines iniurie, and sought to persuade reason. with them with good reason, to keepe promise with the Romains, and to offer them no wrong, out the food. But if they would not yeld to reason, whom they sought to persuade: then they called the goddes to the witnes thereof, and prayed them, that if they dyd not most earnestly incense the ROMAINES, to pursue that most instely apperteined vnto their right, that all euills and mischieues of the warres might fall vpon them felues, and on their countrie. This done, they dyd B threaten open warres against such enemies. And if the Fectales would not cosentto open warres, and dyd happen to speake against them: it was not lawfull in that case, neither for priuate persone, nor for the King him selfe to make any warres. But like a just prince, he must haue leaue by their sufferance to make the warres. Then dydhe consider, & consult, by what meanes he might best procure, & prosecute the same. Concerning this matter, they indge that the ill happe which came to the ROMAINES, when the cittie of ROME was taken and facked by the GAYLES, chaunced instely for breaking of this holy institution. For at that time, the barbarous people belieged the cittie of the CLVSINIAN s: and Fabius Ambustus was fent ambassadour vnto them, to fee if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill aunswer: whereupon Fabius thincking his embasie had bene ended, and being som-

Fortune fauored him in this chalege: for he flew the GAVLE and stripped him in the fielde. The GAVLE s feeing their man flayne, fent immediately an heraulde to Rome, to accuse Fabius, howe against all right and reason, he beganne warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then consulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the handes of the Gav-LES, as one that had broken the lawe of armes, & had deserued it: but he made friends to the people which fauored him very much, & by their meanes escaped his deliuerie, and punishment. Whereat enery tion of the man being greatly affrayed, and discoraged, they faye there fell from heaven a target of copper, which lighted betweene the handes of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which heaven. the King him selfe affirmed he heard, of the Nymphe Egeria, and the Muses. To wit, that this target was fent from heauen, for the health and preservation of the cittie: and therefore he should keepe it carefully, and cause eleuen other to be cast and made, all like vnto the same in facion and greatnes, to the ende, that if any would enterprise to steale it, he should not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he faid, he was commaunded to conse-

E crate the place to the Muses (in the which he dyd oftentimes companie with them) and also the fieldes which were neere thereabouts: and likewise to geue the fountaine that sprange in that place, vnto the Vestalls professed, that every daye they might drawe water at that well, to washe the san Eurrie of their temple. The successe hereof proued his words true, for the sicknes ceased incontinently. So he assembled all the chief crastes men then in Rome, to proue which of them would take vpo him to make one like vnto that. Euery man despayred to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellentest workeman that was in those dayes) dyd make them all fo fute like, that Numa him felfe dyd not knowe the first target, when they were all layed together. So he ordeined these priests Salij, to have the custodie of these targets, to fee them safekept. They were called Salig, not after the name of a SALIAN borne in SAMO- they were called Salig, not after the name of a SALIAN borne in SAMO- they were called Salig, not after the name of a SALIAN borne in SAMO-

Moreouer, all their dauncing confifteth in mouing of their feete: for they handle them finely, making tornes aboue ground and beneath, with a fodaine measure, & a maruelous force of agilitie. They call these targets Ancylia, bicause of their facion, which is not altogether compasse: for they are not all round as other comon targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the endes bowing in many foldes, and one so neere another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon, Or elsthey are so called, bicause Ancon signifieth an elbow, ypon which they carie them. All these derivations are written in the historie of Iuba, who in any case will hauethis word Ancylia to be drawen out B of the Greeke tongue. And it maye be also they were so called, bicause the first came from aboue, which the GRECIANS call Anecathen : or els for healing the ficke, which is called Acesis. Or els for ceasing of the drines, which in Greke is called, Anchmon Lysis, Or for the ending of all diseases and euills, for which cause the Athenians call Castor and Pollux, Anacas: if they lust to gene this word his derivation from the Greeke tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldsmithe had for the making of these targets was, that the Saly vnto this daye doe make mention of him, in their fonge, which they finge going through the cittie, & dauncing of their daunce all armed. Howbeit some thincke they saye not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, auncient memorie. But Numa after he had ordeined and inflituted these orders of priests, built his palace neere vnto the temple of Vesta, which holdeth his name Regia at this daye, to C faye, the Kings palace. In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to facrifice to the goddes, or to teache the Priestes what they should doe, or howe with them he should best conteplate all heauenly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this daye, Quirinall, the place whereof is yet to be seene. But in all these sacrifices, ceremonies, and processions of the Priestes, there were allwayes husshers that went before, crying to the people, kepe filence, and tend vpon divine feruice. For they fave the Pythagorians thought it good, that men should not worshippe the godds, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing:but they thought it mete, that men should of purpose goe out of their houses, to serue & praye vnto them. Euen so king Numa thought it not meete, that his subjects should come to see, and heare divine service negligently, as it were for a facion, and only to be D rydof it, as heeding an other thing: but he would have them fet a fide all other busines, and employ their thoughts & harts only vpon the principall feruice of religion, & deuotion towards the godds. So that during feruice time, he would not have heard any noise, any knocking, boufing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in all artificers shoppes of occupation, whereof at this daye yet they see some signes, and tokens, remaining in their facrifices at ROME. For all the time the Augure beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any facrifice, the vergers crie alowde: Hoe age, which meaneth, tend this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to call their wittes home, & to thincke on that which is in hand. Also there are many of his orders like the preceptes of the Pythagorians. For as they dyd warne men, not to fit vpon a litle bussihell, not to cut fire with a sword, not to looke behinde them when they goe abroade: E sude of Numa to facrifice to the celestiall godds in an odde number, and to the goddes of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts, they would not have the common people to have any knowledge or vnderstäding. Euen so there are many institutions of Numa, the reasons whereof are hidden and kept fecret: as not to offer wine to the godds of the vine neuer cut, & not to facrifice vnto them without meale:& to turne a turne about when they doe reuerence to the godds, & to fit down after they have worshipped them. And as touching the two first ordinances, it seemeth that by them he did recomend clemecy, & humanity, as being a parte of the deuotion towards the godds. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make, that worthippe the goddes: they saye it representeth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thincketh it should rather come of this: for that the teples being fet to the east, he that worshippeth F entring into the teple, sheweth his backe to the West, & for this cause turneth towardes that parte, & afterwards returneth againe towards god: doing the whole turne, & ending the confummation

A fummation of his prayer, by this double adoration which he maketh before & behinde. Onles peraduenture that he ment fecretly to fignifie, & gene them to vnderstande by this turning & changing of their looke, that which the E GYPTI ANS figured by their wheels in showing therby that these worldly things were neuer constant & in one state. And therfore, that we should rake it thankfully, & pacietly beare it, in what forte soeuer it pleased god to chaunge or alter our life. And where he comaunded that they should fit after they had worshipped god: they saved it was a token of a good hope vnto them that prayed, that their prayers should be exalted and that their goods should remaine safe, & sticke by the Other save, that this ease & sitting, is a separating the fro doing: & therfore he would they should fit in the teples of the godds to shew they had done that which they had in had before, to the end to take of the godds the beginning B of another. And it maye well be also, that it was referred to the thing we spake of a little before.

That Numa would accustome his people, not to serue the godds, nor to speake to them at all as they paffed by, or did any other thing, or were in hafte: but would have them praye vnto the godds when they had time & leyfure, & all other busines at that time set a parte. By this good instruction & training them vnto religion, the cittie of Rome by litle & litle came to be so tra-Ctable, & had the great power of king Numa in such admiratio: that they tooke all to be as true By what as the gospell that he spake, though it had no more likelyhood of trothe, then tales deuised of means Numa

Nenertheles in the end, peeiuing they were to fast, as to escape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, & taught him the purifying against light The parifying ning & thunder, which they make yet at this daye with omos, heare, & pilchers, Other faye of thunder. was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Inpiter out of heaven, with their conjuring & magicke: whereat Impiter being offended; aunswered in choller, that hosticuld make it with heads. But Numa added straight, of onios: Impiter replied, of men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a litle away the cruelty of the commandement What heares? Implee auniwered, quicke E hears. And Numa put to pilchers also. ma did wholy deuide it vnto the nedie inhabitas to releue the, & to bring them out of pouerty:

(which carieth men hedlog into mischief, & discourageth them to labour) to the end that plo-ciuill & gentle. For there is no exercise nor occupation in the world, which so sodainely bringeth a man, to loue & defire quietnes, as doth husbadrie & tillage: & yet to defend a mans own, there is in it corage & hardines to fight. But greedy defire, violetly to take from others, & vniustely to occupie that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husbadmen. And therfore Numa having brought in husbandrie amogest his subjects, as a medecine & meane to make them love quiernes:was defirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble & getle of condition, then to increase them in riches. He deuided all the territorie of Rome into certen parts which he called Pages: as much to faye, as villages. And in every one of them he ordeined controllers & visiters, which should survey all about: & he him self somtimes went abroade in ligent, he aduaunced them vnto honour, & gaue them countenauce & authoritie: other which he fawe flowthfull & negligent, by rebuking & reprouing of them, he made them amend. But amongest all his ordinaunces which he made, one aboue all the rest caried the praise: and that was, that he deuided his people into fundrie occupatios. For the cittie of Rome feemed yet to be made of two nations, as we have fayed before : and to speake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impossible to take away all factions, & to make there should be no quarrells nor contentions be-twene both parts. Wherefore he confidered, that when one will mingle two bodies or fimples together, which for their hardnes & cotrarie natures cannot well fuffer mixture: then he breaks der, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen so he thought it was best to denide the people also into many small partes: by meanes whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more eafely take away the first & the greatest parte, when it should be deuided & separated thus into fundrie forts. And this division he made by arts & occupatios: as minstrells, goldsmiths, carpinters, diers, shoemakers, tawers, taners, bell founders, & pot makers, & so forth through other craftes & occupations. So that he brought enery one of these into one bodie.&

copanie by it felf: & ordeined vinto euery particular mysterie or craste; their feasts, assemblies, &

feruices, which they should make vnto the godds, according to the dignitie & worthings of enery occupatio. And by this meanes, he first tooke away all faction: that neither side saved, nor thought any more, those are Sabynes, these area om aines, these are of Tating, these are of Ro- E mulus. Infomuch as this division was an incorporating, & an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinauces, they did much comend his reforming of the law, that gaue libertie vnto fathers to fell their childre. For he did except childre already maried, so they were maried with their fathers confent & goodwill: judging it to be to cruell & ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought the had maried afree man should finde her felf to be the wife of a bond ma. He begane also to mende a litle the calender, not foexactly as he should have done, nor yet alname of the together ignoratly. For during the raigne of Romulus, they yield the moneths cofuledly, without any order or reason, making some of them twenty dayes & lesse, and others fine & thirtie dayes & more without knowing the differece between the course of the sunne & the moone: & only they observed this rule, that there was three hudred & three score dayes in the yere. But Nama F confidering the inequality floode vpon eleuen dayes for that the 12 revolutios of the moone are ronne in 300 fiftie & foure dayes, & the revolution of the funne, in 365 dayes, he doubled

A the 11, dayes, wherof he made a moneth: which he placed fro 2. yeres to 2. yeres, after the moneth of February, & the ROMAINES called this moneth put betwene, Mercidinum, which had 22 dayes, And this is the correction that Numa made, which fince hath had a farre better amedment. He did also chaunge the order of the moneths. For Marche which before was the first, he made it now the third & Tanuary the first, which under Romulus was the 11. & February the 122 & last, Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two, Ianuary & February. For the Ro-MALNE'S at the beginning had but tenne moneths in the yere: as some of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yere. And the ARCADIANS amongest the GRECIANS haue but foure moneths for their yere. The A CARNANI ANS have fixe to the yere. And the E G Y P- The rere di-TIANS had first but one moneth to their yere: & afterwards they made foure moneths for their werfily com-

B yere. And this is the cause why they seeme (albeit they inhabite in a new coutrie) to be neuertheles the auncientest people of the world: for that in their chronicles they reckon vp such infinite nuber of yeres, as those which counte the moneths for the yeres. And to proue this true, that the Romaines at the beginning had but tenne moneths in the yere, and not twelve: it is easely to be judged by the name of the last, which they call at this daye Deceber . And that the moneth of Marche was also the first, maye be conjectured by this: for the fift moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the 6. Sextilis, & so the other in order following the nubers. For if Ianuary & February had then bene the first, of necessitie the moneth of July, which they call Quintilia. must have bene named Septéber: considering also that it is very likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was also by him ordeined to be the first. The second was Aprill: fo called of the name Aphrodite, that is to faye Venus, vnto whom they make open facrifice in this moneth. And on the first daye of the same, women doe washe them selues, hauing a garlandof myrtle vpon their heades. Howbeit some other save, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was only called Aprilio, bicause then is the chiefest force & strength of the spring, at which season the earth doth open, and the seedes of plants and erbes beginne to bud & showe forth, which the word it selfe doth signifie. The moneth following next after that, is called Maye: after the name of Maia, the mother of Mercurie, vnto whom the moneth is cofecrated. *The moneth of Iune is so called also, bicause of the quality of that season, which * Poraduenis as the youthe of the yere. Although some will saye, that the moneth of Maye was named of trace ye must as as the youthe of the yere. Although some will saye, that the moneth of Maye was named of trace ye must be seen to the year. this word Majores, which fignifieth as much as the elders: and the moneth of June, of Juniores, Greke D which fignifies the younger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the num: (and the start of the star

But pas) which is Ders according to their order, Quintilis, sextims, september, Solver, seven and sexting of the Quintilis, was afterward called Iulius, of the name of Iulius. Cafar, who slew Pompeisus. And Sexting and of Iunio tilis was named Augustus, Octavius Gefars frecessour in the empire, who was also furnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they should call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus , and the other Domitianus . But that helde not longe: for so soone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recourred their auncient names againe. The two last moneths only, have ever cotinued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the least traslated: the moneth of February doth fignifie as much as purging, or arthe least the derivation of the word sowndeth neere it.

In this moneth, they doe facrifice of plantes, * & doe celebrate the feast of the Lupercales, in * some side which there are many things agreable; and like to the facrifices made for purification . A withstanding it was once shut vp in the time of Augustus, after he had slaine Antonie: & once before also in the yere when Marcus Attilius & Titus Manlius were Cosuls. But that cotinued The Romains not long, for it was opened again incontinetly, by reason of warres that came vpo them some after. Howbeit during the raigne of Numa, it was never one day opened, but remained shut cotinually by the space of three & forty veres together. For alloccasios of warres, were then veterly dead & forgotten:bicause at Rome the people were not only through thexaple of instice, clemécie, & the goodnes of the King brought to be quiet, & to loue peace: but in the citties thereabouts, there beganne a maruelous chaunge of manners & alteration of life, as if some gentle aver had breathed on them, by some gratious & healthfull wind, blowe from Rome to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens mindes fuch a harty defire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, & to serue the goddes truely : that almost through all I TALIE, there was nothing but feastes, playes, sacrifices, & bankets. The people did traffike & frequent together, without feare or dauger, & vifited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the fpringing fountaine of Numaes wisedom many pretie brookes & streames of good & honest life had rone ouer all ITALIE,& had watered it:& that the mildnes of his wisdom had fro handto hand bene disparsed through the whole world. Insomuch, as the ouer excessive speaches the Poets accustomably doe vie, were not sufficiét enough to expresse the peaceable raigne of that time. There: fiders vycaue their cobyvebbes daye and night in harnesses, which wont to serve for warre: there: cancred rust doth fret the steele full bright of trenchant blades, well whet in many a larre. There: mighty speares for lacke of rufe are eaten, with rotten wormes: and in that countrie there. the braying trompe dothe neuer feeme to threaten. their quiet eares with blasts of bloudy feare. There: in that lande, no drowv sie sleepe is broken, with hotte alarmes, which terrours doe betoken.

For during all king Numaes raigne, it was never heard that ever there were any warres, civil diffention, or innouation of government attempted against him, not yet any secret enmitteer malice borne him neither any cospiracie once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether D it was for feare of displeasing the godds (which visibly feemed to take him into their protectio) or for the reuerent regarde they had vnto his vertue, or for his prosperous & good successe all the time he raigned, I cannot tell howbeit he fought to keepe men still pure, & honest, from all wickednes, & layed most open before the eyes of the whole world, a very exaple of that which Plato long time after did affirme, & faye, concerning true gouernmet: which was. That the only meane of true quietnes,&remedy from all euill(which euer troubleth men)was:when by fome divine ordinaunce from about there meteth in one person, the right maiestie of a King & the minde of a wife philosopher, to make vertue gouernesse & ruler ouervice. For in deede happie ming the fair is such a wife man, & more happy are they, which may e heare the grave counsaill, & good lesfons of fuch a mouthe. And there me thincks needeth no force, no copultion, no threates nor E extremitie to bridle the people. For men feeing the true image of vertue in their yifible prince, & in the example of his life, doe willingly growe to be wife, & of them felues doe fall into love hking, and friendshippe together, and doe vie all temperature stuft dealing, and good order one toward another, leading their life withour offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe pointe of felicitie, and the most happie good that can light vato men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wisdome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners fuch a good disposition: and this, Numa aboue all other; seemed best to knowe and understand. Furthermore, touching his wives and children, there are great contrarieties among the historiographers. For some of them saye, he never maried other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one only daughter, and the was called Pompilia. F of every one of the which (by fuccession from the father to the some) have descended the

A noblest races, and most auncient houses of the Romaines. As the house of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the house of the Pinarians, of Pinus: the house of the Calphurnians, of Calpus: & the house of the Mamercias, of Mamercus. All which families by reason of their first progenitor haue kept the furname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which doe reproue the two first faving that they dyd write to gratifie the families, making them falfely to descend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is fayed, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia; but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martius, the sonne of the same: Martius, Tompilia mawhich perfuaded him to accept the kingdome of Rome. For he went with him to Rome, to Marine Coremaine there: where they dyd him the honour to receyue him into the number of the Se- riolanus. R natours. After the death of Numa, Martius the father stoode against Tullus Hostilius for the Martins the fuccession of the Realme, and being ouercome, he killed him selfe for sorowe. But his sonne Senatour at Martius, who maried Pompilia, continued still at ROME, where he begotte Ancus Martius. Rome. who was king of Rome after Tullus Hostilius, and was but fine yere olde when Numa dyed. Ancus Mar-Whose death was not sodaine. For he dyed consuming by litle and litle, aswell through age, of cains as also through a lingring disease that waited on him to his ende, as Piso hath written: and Martius Coas ano through a ling threat that water on min to his cine, as 1 for his witten and violanus.

Numa at his death was little more, then four fcore yere old. But the pompe and honour done the death of vnto him at his funeralles, made his life yet more happie and glorious. For all the people his Name. neighbours, friendes, kinfemen, and allies of the Romaine scame thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publicke contributions to honour his obsequies. The noble men selues C of the cittie (which were called Patricians) caried on their shoulders the very bedd, on which the course laye, to be conueyed to his graue. The Priestes attended also on his bodie, and so dyd all the rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his tumbe, all bewaling and lamenting his death, with teares, fighes, and mournings. Not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their dearest kinseman, and nearest friende that had dyed before he was olde. They burnt not his bodie, bicause (as some fave) he commaunded the contrarie by his will and testament: but they made two coffines of stone, which they buried at the foote of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they layed his bodie, & in the other the holy bookes which he had written him felfe, much like vnto those, Ninnaes which they that made the lawes among the GRECIANS dyd write in tables. But bicause in booker. D his life time he had taught the priestes, the substaunce of the whole conteined in the same the willed the holy tables which he had written, hould be buried with his bodie. For he thought it not reasonable that so holy matters should be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens manners & exercises. And he followed herein they saye, the Pythagorians, who would not put policy the their worckes in writing, but dyd printe the knowledge of them in their memories, whom Pythagerias they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any left making manner of persone the hidden rules and secretes of Geometrie, which had not bene worthy of them: then they fayed the goddes by manifest tokens would threaten, to reuenge such facriledge and impictie, with some great destruction and miserie. Therefore, seeing so many things agreable, and altogether like betweene Numa and Pythagoras, I easely pardone those which E mainteine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted, and converfant together . Valerius Antias the historian writeth, there were twelve bookes written con- 13. bookes of cerning the office of Priestes, and twelve other contening the philosophie of the GRECIAHS. priesthood. And that foure hundred yeres after (in the same yere when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus 12, bookes of Bebius were consuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earthe. Philosophic. and discouered these coffines: and the liddes and couers thereof being caried awaye, they founde the one altogether voyde, having no manner of likelyhoode, or token of a bodie that had layen in it: and in the other they founde these bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Pretor) who had the charge to reade them ouer, and to make the reporte of them. But he having perused them over, declared to the Senate, that he p thought it not convenient the matters conteined in them should be published vnto the simple people : and for that cause they were caried into the market place, and there were openly burnte. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and just men, that they are farre more prayfed and esteemed after their death, then before: bicause that enuie A pressed after doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding, the misfortunes which chaunced afterwardes vnto the fine Kings which raigned at times of New Rome after Numa, have made his honour thine, with much more noble glorie then before. For the last of them was driven out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very olde. And of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tullus Hostilius which raigned after Numa, deriding, & contemning the most parte of his good and holy inftitutions, and chiefly his deuotion towardes the goddes, as a thing which made men lowly and fainte harted: dyd affone as euer he came to be King, turne all his subjects hartes to the warres. But this mad humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a straunge, & most grieuous disease that followed him, which brought him B to chaunge his minde, and dyd farre otherwise turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouerfearfull superstition, which dyd nothing yet resemble the true Religion & deuotion of Numa; &befides, he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconvenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was striken and burnt with lightning.

Lycurgus with Numa.

HVS having written the lives of Lyeurgus and Numa, the matter re-HVS having written the nuce of Lywa quireth, though it be fomewhat harde to doe, that we comparing the one with the other thould fet out the difference betweene them. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deedes doe thewe it sufficiently. As in their temperature, their denotion to the goddes, their wisdome in gouerning, and their discreete handling of E their people, by making them beleeue that the goddes had reuealed the lawes vnto them, which they established. And nowe to come vnto their qualities, which are diuersely, & seuerally commended in either of them. Their first qualitie is, that Numa accepted the Kingdome, and Lyeurgus gaue it vp. The one receyued it, not feeking for it: and the other hauing it in his handes, did reftore it againe. The one being astraunger, and a private man: was by straungers elected & chosen, their lorde & King. The other being in possession a King, made him selfe againe a private persone. Suer it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iustice: but it is a goodlier thing to esteeme iustice abouea Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputatio, that he was judged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred so noble a minde in the other, that he esteemed not to be a F King. Their fecond qualitie is, that like as in an instrumetof musicke, the one of them did tune and wrest vp theslacke stringes which were in Sparta: so the other slackened, and set them

A lower, which were to highe mounted in ROME. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater. VV has things For he did not persuade his cittizens, to plucke of their armour & curates, nor to laye by their fwordes: but only to leave their golde & filuer, to for fake their fofte beddes, their fine wrought rables, and other curious riche furniture, and not to leaue of the trauell of warres, to geue them felues only vnto feaftes, facrifices, and playes. But to the contrarie, to gene vp bancketing and feasting, & continually to take paynes in the warres, yelding their bodies to all kinde of paynes. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, easely persuaded all-that he would: and the other, by putting him felfe in daunger, and being hurtealfo, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpose and defire. Numa his muse was so gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his cittizens, which before were B furious and violent, were now fortractable and civill, that he taught them to love peace and iuflice. And to the contrarie, if they will compell me to number amongeft the lawes and ordinaunces of Lyeurgus, that which we have written touching the I LOTES, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I must of force confesse that Numa was muche wifer, more gentle, and civill in his lawes, confidering that euen vnto those which in deede were borne slaues, he gaue some litle tast of honour, & sweetnes of libertie, having ordained, that in the feastes of Saturne, they Slaves fas Interest of nonour, & incention in the rest of none at meate, at their mafters owne table. Some holde opinion, that this custome mafters at

was brought in by king Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage Saturnes brought in much fruite, should have some pleasure thereof to make good cheere with the first featis, fruites of the same. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembraunce of the equalitie, mar. ib. 1. which was emogest men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither master nor seruaunte, but all men were a like equall, as brethern or hinsemen. To conclude, it seemeth either of them tooke a direct course, thought best to them selues, to frame their people vnto temperaunce, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre best, and the other iustice: onles it were that men would saye, that for the diuersitie of the nature or custome of their people (which were almost contrarie in manners) they were both compelled to vie also contrary and divers meanes from other. For it was not Divers causes of a fainte harte, that Numa tooke from his people the vie of armes, and delire to be in warres: of the diarif-but it was to the ende they should not doe any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus also studies in a state of make his people souldiers and warlike, to hurte others: but for seare rather that others mad 13-D should hurte them. And so, to cut of the excesse in the one, and to supply the defect of the other: they were both enforced to bring in a straunge manner of gouernment. Furthermore, touching their feuerall kinde of gouernment, & dividing of their people into states and companies: that of Numa was maruelous meane and base, and framed to the liking of the meanest people, making a bodie of a cittie, and a people compounded together of all fortes, as goldefinithes, minstrells, founders, shoemakers, and of all sortes of craftes men & occupations together . But that of Lysurgus, was directly contrarie: for his was more seuere and tyrannicall, in governing of the nobility, casting all crastes and base occupations upon bondemen & straungers, and putting into the handes of his cittizens the shield and launce, suffering them to exerciseno other arte orscience, but the arte and discipline of warres, as the true ministers of Mars:

which all their life time neuer knewe other science, but only learned to obey their captaines, and to commaund their enemies. For to have any occupation, to buye and fell, or to trafficke, free men were expressely forbidden: bicausethey should wholy & absolutely be free. And all sciences to get money was lawfull for flaues, and the I LOTES: being counted for as vile an occupation, as to dreffe meate, and to be a scullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference 4mogest his people, but only tooke away couetous desire to be riche by warres: but otherwise, he did not forbid them to get goodes by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regarde to bring all to equalitie, and to be a like wealthy, but fuffered enery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuet pouertie, which crept in, & spred farre in his cittle. Which he should have looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequalitie F amongest them, and that his cittizens for substaunce were in manner equal one with another for then was the time whe he should have made head against avarice, to have stopped the mischieues & inconveniences, which fell out afterwards, & they were not litle. For that only was the fountaine and roote, of the most parte of the greatest euills & mischieues, which happened § afterwardes in Rome. And as touching the division of goodes: neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality vnto the one, was a groud & foundation of his common wealth, which he afterwards inflituted: and vnto other, it could not be. For this diuision being made not long before the time of his predecessour, there was no great neede to chaunge the first, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching mariages, & their children to be in common, both the one & the other wifely fought to take awaye alloccasion of iealousie: but yet they tooke not both one course. For the Ro-MAINE husband, having children enough to his contentation: if another that lacked children came vnto him, to praye him to lende him his wife, he might graunte her vnto him, and it was in him to gene her altogether, or to lende her for a time, & to take her afterwardes againe. But R the LACONIAN, keeping his wife in his house, & the mariage remaining whole & vnbroken.

might let out his wife to any man that would require her to have children by her: naye furthermore, many (as we have told you before) did them selves intreat men, by whom they thought to have a trimme broode of children, & layed them with their wives. What difference, I praye you was between these two customes? fauing that the custome of the LACONIANS shewed, that the husbads were nothing angrie, nor grieued with their wines for those things, which for forrowe and iealousie doth rent the hartes of most maried men in the world. And that of the ROMAINES was a simplicitie somewhat more shamefast, which to coue pit, was shadowed yet with the cloke of matrimonie, and contract of mariage: confessing that to vie wife & children by halfes together, was a thing most intollerable forhim. Furthermore, the keeping of maides C to be maried by Numaes order, was much straighter & more honorable for womanhed: & Lycurque order having to much scope and libertie, gaue Poets occasion to speake, and to geue and Andromanes: to faye manhood. And Euripides fayeth also of them. Good nutbrowene girles which left, their fathers house at large, and sought for young mens companie & tooke their wware in charge: And shevved their thighes all bare the taylour did them wurong, on eche side open were their cotes the stytts were all to long.

And in deede to fave truely, the fides of their petticotes were not fowed beneath: fo that as they went, they shewed their thighes naked and bare. The which Sophoeles doth easely declare D by these verses:

them furnames not very honest. As Ibycus called them Phanomeridas: to saye, thighe showers:

The songe which you shall singe shalbe the sonnet sayde, by Hermione lusty laffe that strong and sturdy mayde: Which trust her pettreote about her midle shorte. and fet to shevve her naked hippes, in francke and frendly forte.

And therefore it is fayed, the LACON wives were bolde, manly, & stowte against their husbands, namely the first. For they were wholy mistresses in the house, and abroade: yea they had minus were to law on their fide also, to vtter their mindes franckly cocerning the chiefest matters. But Nama euer reserved the honour and dignitie vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken them awaye perforce, disposed them selues to B

For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibite them to speake, although it were for things necessarie, onles it were in the presence of their husbands. In so much as it is reported, that a woman chauncing one daye to pleade her cause in persone, openly before the indges: the Senate hearing of it, did fend immediately vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognosticate to the cittie, And therfore Name thought the memorie of the naughty women, would much commend the great humilitie, gentlenes, & obedience of the good. For like as our GRECIAN historiographers doe note those which were the first that killed any of their cittizes, or haue fought with their brethern, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: enen R fo the ROMAINES doe note that Spurius Carnilius was the first which for sooke his wife two hundred & thirtie yeres after the first foundation of Roms, which was never done by any beA fore. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thales, was the first which ever brawled or smark relled with her mother in lawe called Gegania, in the time when Tarquine furnamed the provide raiened: fo well and honeftly were the orders of Numa deuifed concerning mariage. Mistern uer, the age and time of marying of maydes, which both the one and the other orderned : dorb agree with the rest of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they should be mavied till they were of good yeres, and women growen: to the ende that they knowing the company of man at fuch time as nature requireth, it should be a beginning of their pleasure and lone; and not of griefe and hate, when the should be compelled vnto it before time agreable by nature. and bicause their bodies also should be more stronge and able to beare children; and to indure the mothers painefull throwes and trauell in childe bearing, considering they are maried to no B other ende but to beare children . But the ROMAINES to the contrarie . doe marve them at twelue yeres of age, and vnder: faying, that by this meanes their bodies & manners be wholv theirs, which doe marye them, being affured that no body els could touch them. By this reason it is manifest, that the one is more naturall, to make themstrong to beare children: & the other more morall, to geue them the forme & manner of conditios, which a man would have them to kepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for educatio of childre, that they should be brought vp, instructed, & taught, vnder the selfe same masters & gouernours, which should haue an eye to make them drincke, eate, playe, and exercise them selues honestly, and orderly Home much etogether: Numa made no more provision for the same, then the least maker of lawes that ever discipline is was, and nothing in comparison of Lyeurgus. For Numa left the parents at libertie, to vse their worther medle one with another, but in a rough storme or tempest, when every man is affrayed of his owne life. For otherwise, no man careth but for him selfe. And other makers of lawes also, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath scaped them through ignoraunce, or some time through lacke of sufficient power and authoritie. But a wise philosopher, having receyued a realme of

As if they should not frame the manners of children, and facion them from their cradell all to one ende: but should be as it were like passengers in one shippe, which being there, some for one busines, other for another purpose, but all to diuers endes, doe neuer

And this was of fuche force, that for the space of fine hundred yeres & more, Lyeurgus chief lawes and ordinaunces remained in full E perfection, as a deepe woded dye, which went to the bottome, and pearced into the tender

For he was no foner dead, but they opened both mat orders the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he so carefully had kept shut all his reigne, as if in deede he had kept in warres there, vnder locke and keye, and they filled all I TALIE with murder and bloude: & this his godly, holy, and iust gouernment which his Realme enjoyed all his time, did not last long after, bicause it had not the bonde of education, and the discipline of children which should mainteine it. Why, maye a man saye to me here: hath not Rome excelled ftill, and preuailed more & more in cheualrie? This question requireth a long aunswer, fo maruelously increase & growe mightie: and that the LACED AMONIANS to the contrarie. to foone as they beganne to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authoritie and fwaye, fell afterwards to be of small accompt. So that having lost the soueraintie & commaundemet over GRECE, they stoode in great hazarde also to be overthrowen for ever. But in trothe it was Why Numa some divine thing in Numa, that he being a meere straunger, the Romains dyd seeke him, to make him King, and that he could fo chaunge all, and rule a whole cittie as he lifted (not yet iovned together) without neede of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be affilted with the best of the citty, in resisting the comons of LACED & MON, but he could neuer otherwise haue kept them in peace, & made them loue together, but by his only wisdom & iustice.

dicated vnto Aclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, al-

leageth the wordes of one Philocles, in which he speaketh against the common opinion of those that have written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the fonne of Execestides, a man but reasonably to live, although otherwise he was of the noblest and most auncient house of the cittie of ATHENS. For of his fathers fide, he was descended of king Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, the was colin germaine vnto Pilistra-

For this cause euen from the beginning there was great friendshippe betwene them, partely for their kinred, and partely also for the curtesie, and beawtie of Pisistratus, with B Solon & Pi- whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of state and gouernment: yet this square bred no violent inconuenience betwene them, but they referued in their hartes still their auncient amitie, which continued the memorie of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no flaved man to withfland beawtie, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifest to all, afwell by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by alawe of his owne: wherein he dyd forbid bondmento perfume them selves, or to be louers of children. Who placed this lawe A statute for among honest matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better forte, and forbidding it to the basest. They saye also that Pisstratus selse was in loue with Charmus, and that he dyd set vp the litleimage of loue, which is in Academia, where they were wont to light the holy candell. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) having spent his goodes in liberalitie, and deedes of curtefie, though he might eafely have bene relieved at divers mens handes with money, he was yet ashamed to take any, bicause he came of a house which was wont rather to geue and was yet attained to take them felues: so being yet a young man, he deuised to trade mar-relieute others, then to take them felues: so being yet a young man, he deuised to trade mar-chaundise. How beit other saye, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to see the worlde, and to him self in Igrouve olde, learning fill. Also he was not couetously bent, nor loued riches to much: for he sayd in one place:

B manifestly: for that being nowe olde, he commonly vsed to save this verse:

But if is toye and chief delight doe breede. for to beholde the fayer and heauenly face, of some sweete wrife, which is adornde with grace.

For fuer wwho fo desires by wwickednes to thriue: shall finde that justice from fuch goodes, will justly him deprive.

There is no law forbiddeth an honest man, or getleman, greedily to screepe goods to gether, & more then may fuffice: & likewife to get fufficient to mainteine one with all & to defrave all needefull charges. In those dayes no state was discommended, as fayeth Hesiodus, nor any arte or science made any difference between men: but marchaundisethey thought an honorable state, as that which deliuered meanes, to traffike into straunge & farre contries, to get acquain- The com tauce with states, to procure the love of princes, & chiefly to gather the experience of the world. So that there hauebene marchauts, which heretofore haue bene fouders of great citties: as he which first buylt Massilia, after he had obteined the friedshippe of the Gavis solvelling builded Has by the river of Rhosne. And they saye also, that Thales Milesius the wife, did traffike marchau Gila. dife, & that Hippocrates the mathematike did eue fo: & likewife that Plato trauelling into Egipt, Thales.

E did beare the whole charges of his iorney, with the gaines he made of the fale of oile he caried Hipportates. thither. They remember also, that Solon learned to be lauish in expence, to fare deligately, & to machannus speake wantonly of pleasures in his Poemes, somwhat more licettously then became the grauity of a Philosopher: only bicause he was brought vp in the trade of marchaudise, wherein for that men are maruelous subject to great losses & daugers, they seeke otherwiles good chere to driue these cares awaye, and libertie to make much of them selues . Yet it appeareth by these verses, that Solon accompted him selfe rather in the number of the poore, than of the riche.

Riche men (oftimes) in levedest lines doe range, and often seene that vertuous men be poore: Yet would the good their goodnes never chaunge with leved estate, although their wealthe be more. For vertue stands all vvayes, both firme and stable: When richesroue, and feldome are durable.

This Poetry at the beginning he vsed but for pleasure, and when he had ley sure, writing no A matter of importaunce in his verses. Afterwards he dyd set out many graue matters of philosophie, and the most parte of such things as he had deuised before, in the government of a common weale, which he dyd not for historic or memories sake, but only of a pleasure to discourse: for he sheweth the reasons of that he dyd, and in some places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the Athenians. And some affirme also he went about to write his lawes and ordinaunces in verse, and doe recite his preface, which was this:

Vouchesaue ô mighty Ioue, of heaven and earth highe King: to graunt good fortune to my lauves, and heasts in everie thing. And that their glorie grouve in such triumphaunt wife, as maye remaine in fame for aye surhich lines and neuer dies.

He chiefly delited in morall philosophie, which treated of government & common weales: in morall, but as the most parte of the wise men dyd of those times. But for naturall philosophie, he was very rall philosogroffe and fimple, as appeareth by these verses, phie.

The clattering hayle, and softly falling snowve doe breede in ayer and fall from cloudes on hye. The dreadfull clappes, which thunder bolts doe throwe, doe come from heaven and lightninges bright in skye: The fea it felfe by boysterous blastes dothe rore wwhich (wwere it not prouoked fo full fore) Would be both calme and quiet for to passe, as any element that ever vvas.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the leuen wife men of Grece, who learched further the contemplation of things in common vie among men, than he . For fetting him a parte, all the others got the name of wisdome, only for their viderstanding in matters of state and gouernment. It is reported that they met on a daye all seuen together in the cittie of Delphes, and another time in the cittie of Corinthe, where Periander got them together at a feast that he made to the other fixe. But that which most increased their glorie, and made their fame most spoken of, was the sending backe againe of the three sooted stoole when they all had refused it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, howe certaine fisher men of the Ile of Co, cast their nettes into the sea, and certaine D ftraungers passing by, that came from the cittie of MILETVM, did buye their draught of fishe at aduenture, before the net was drawen. And when they drue it vp, there came vp in the net

Hellen three a three footed stoole of massy gold, which men saye, Hellen (as she dyd returne from TROYE) had throwen in in that place, in memory of an aunciet oracle the called then vnto her minde. Thereupon the straungers & fisher men first fell at strife about this three sooted stoole, who (hould haue it: but afterwardes the two citties tooke parte of both sides, on their cittizens behalfe. In so much as warres had like to haue followed betwene them, had not the prophetesse Pythia geuen a like oracle vnto them both. That they should geue this three footed stoole vnto the wifest man . Whereupon themen of Co, sent it first to Thales in the cittle of MILEт v м, as being willing to graunte that vnto a private persone, for which they had made warres E The rose mo. with all the MILESIANS before . Thales fayed, he thought Bias a wifer man than him felfe: and so it was sent vnto him. He likewise sent it againe vnto another, as to a wiser man. And that other, sent it also vnto another. So that being thus posted from man to man, and through diuers handes, in the ende it was brought backe againe vnto the cittie of M_{1LETVM} , and deliuered into the handes of Thales the seconde time: and last of all was caried vnto There s, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Ismenian . Howbeit Theophraitus writeth, that first it was sent to the cittle of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the cittle of MILETVM, by Biss consent. And after that it had passed through all their handes, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and lastely it was sent to the cittie of DELPHES. And thus much have the best and most auncient writers written: sauing that some saye in steade of a three sooted stoole, it F was a cuppe that king Crafu fent vnto the cittle of DELPHES. Other faye, it was a pece of

They make mention also of another private meeting betweet Anacharsis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharsis being arrived at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, saying that Anacharsis had this take. Anachar sis replied againe: thou then that arte at home, and in thine owne countrie, beginne to shew me friendshippe. Then Solon wondering at his bolde ready wit, enterteined him very curteoully: and kept him a certaine time in his house, and made him very good cheere, at the felfe same time wherein he was most busie in gouerning the common weale, & making lawes for the state thereof. Which when Anacharsis vnderstoode, he laughed at it, to see that Solon Anacharsis

Neuertheles afterwardes, matters proued rather according to Anacharsis comparison, then agreable to the hope that Solon had conceyued. Thales gaue him neuer a worde at Solons talke that present: but within fewe dayes after he suborned a straunger, which sayed that he came with Thakes but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but tenne dayes before . Furthermore Thales felfe, to lofe them. although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, onles he would confesse that he neither loued friends, kynsemen, nor countrie: howbeit Thales had an adopted sonne, Cristius called Cybistus, which was his fifters sonne. So that ye shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marie, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwardes are ready to dye for feare & forowe, when they fee their bastardes (that they have gotten of their slaves or concubines) fall ficke or dye, and doe vtter wordes farre vnmeete for men of noble corage. And some such there be, that for the death of a dogge, or their horse, are so out of harte, and take such thought, that they are ready to goe into the grounde, they looke so pittiefully. Other some are cleane contrarie, who though they have lost their children, forgone their friendes, or some gentleman deare vnto them, yet no sorowfull worde hath commen from them, neither have they done any vnfeemely thing; but have passed the rest of their life like wife, constant, and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weaknes, which breedeth these ex- R treme forowes, and exceeding feare, in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they loue and desire, by reason of the continual trouble, scare and griefe they feele, by thinc-king howe in time they maye be depriued of it. Nowe we must not arme our selues with pouertie, against the griefe of losse of goodes: neither with lacke of affe ion, against the losse of our friendes: neither with wante of mariage, against the death of children; but we must be armed with reason against misfortunes. Thus have we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS having nowefulteined along and troublesome warre against the MEGA-RIANS, for the possession of the lle of SALAMINA: were in the ende wearie of it, and made Proclamation proclamation straightly commaunding upon payne of death, that no man should presume to C preferre any more to the counfaill of the cittie, the title or question of the possession of the Ile death noman of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open shame, and seeing the most parte of the luto mone the stiest youthes desirous still of warre though their tongues were tyed for feare of the proclamation: he fayned him felfe to be out of his wittes, and caused it to be genen out that Solon was become a foole, and fecretly he had made certaine lamentable vertes, which he had cunned Sol n fained without booke, to finge abroade the cittie. So one daye he ranne fodainly out of his house reconer Salawith a garland on his head, and gotte him to the market place, where the people straight swarmed like bees about him: and getting him vp vpon the stone where all proclamations are vfually made, out he fingeth these Elegies he had made, which beganne after this forte. I here present my selfe (an Heraulde) in this case, which come from Salamina lande that noble wworthy place. My minde in pelting profe, shall never be exprest, But songe in verse Heroycall, for so I thincke it best.

This Elegie is intituled SALAMIN A, and conteineth a hundred verses, which are excellently well written. And these being songe openly by Solon at that time, his friendes incontinently prayled them beyond measure, and specially Pissitratus: and they went about persuading the people that were present, to credit that he spake. Hereupon the matter was so handled amongest them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they beganne to followe the warres with greater furiethen before, appointing Solon to be generall in the same. But the of the temple common tale and reporte is, that he went by fea with Pilistratus vnto the temple of Venus, fur- E of " named Colsade: where he founde all the women at a solemne feast and facrifice, which they 11 Made. Made of custome to the goddesse. He taking occasion thereby, sent from thence a trusty man for of the A- of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to fayne him felfe a reuolted traytour, & that he came of purpose to tell them, that if they would but goe with him, they might take all the chief ladves and gentlewomen of ATHENS ON 2 fodaine. The MEGARIAN'S easely beleeved him, and shipped forthwith certaine souldiers to goe with him . But when Solon perceyued the shippe vnder sayle comming from SALAMINA he commaunded the women to departe, and in steade of them he put lusty beardles springalles into their apparell, and gaue them litle shorte daggers to conuey under their clothes, commaunding them to playe & daunce together vpon the fea fide, vntill their enemies were F landed, and their shippe at anker: and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being decevued by that they lawe a farre of, as soone as euer they came to the shore side, dyd lande in heapes,

A heapes, one in anothers necke, even for greedines to take these women but not a man of them escaped, for they were flayne enery mothers sonne. This stratageame being finely handled, & to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke fea straight, and costed ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the sodaine, and wanne it without much resistance. Other saye that it solon wanne was not raken after this forte: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon first fuch an oracle.

Thou shalt first winne by vouves and sacrifice, of whose dead bones, the dust engraved lies, the helpe of lordes and demy goddes full bright: in westerne soyle, Asopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night passed ouer to SALAMINA, & dyd facrifice to Periphemus & to Cichris, demy goddes of the countrie, Which done, the ATHENIAN'S delivered him fine hundred men, who willingly offered them selues: & the cittie made an accorde with them, R that if they tooke the Ile of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authoritie in the common weale. Solon imbarked his fouldiers into divers fifther botes, and appointed a galliot of thirtie owers to come after him, & he ankred hard by the cittle of SALAMINA, vnder the pointe which looketh towards the Ile of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA. having by chaunce heard some inckling of it, but yet knew nothing of certaintie: ranne prefently in hurly burley to arme them, and manned out a shippe to descrie what it was. But they fondly comming within daunger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS under hatches fast bounde, and in their roomes put aborde in their shippe the choycest souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commaunding them to fet their course direct vpon the cittie, and to keepe them felues as close out of fight as could be. And he him felf with all the rest of his foul-C diers landed prefently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the fielde. Now whilest they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS shippe, entred the hauen, & wanne the towne. This is certainly true, & testified by that which is shewed yet at this daye. For to keepe a memoriall hereof a shippe of A-THENS arriveth quietly at the first, & by & by those that are in the shippe make a great showte, and a man armed leaping out of the shippe, ronneth showting towardes the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme lande and hard by the same is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he sent backe againe those prisoners that he had taken (which were faued from the slaughter of the battell) without any ransome paying. Neuertheles, the MEGARIANS were sharpely bent D ftill, to recouer Salamina again, Much hurte being done & fuffered on both fides: both parts Gran first in the ende made the LACED EMONIANS judges of the quarrell. But vpon judgement genen, beinest the common reporte is, that Homers authoritie dyd Solon good service, bicause he did adde these Megarians verses to the number of shippes, which are in the Iliades of Homer, which he rehearsed before for Salaning.

Aiax that champion stouvte, did leade with him in charge, twelve shippes from Salamina foyle, which he had left at large, and even those selfe same shippes in battell did he cast and place in order for to fight, with enmies force at last. In that same very place, whereas it seemed then the captaines which from Athens came, imbattelled had their men.

the judges, as if they had bene in deede written by Homer.

Howbeit the Athenians selves thinke, it was but a tale of pleasure: and saye that Solon made it appeare to the judges, that Phileus, and Eury/aces (both Aiax sonnes) were made free denizens of ATHENS. Whereupon they gaue the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of ATTIC A: and the other in a towne called MELITVM. And for due proofe thereof, they fave there is yet a certen canton or quarter of the countrie of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philaides, after the name of this Philaus, where Pisstratus was borne. And it is sayed moreouer, that Solon (bicause he would throughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did alleage that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in ME-E GARA they burie the dead with their faces to the East: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denieth it, saying that the MEGARIANS dyd burie them

The mounter also with their faces towards the West: alleaging moreouer, that at ATHENS euerie corse had A 2 2 rist with his owne beere or coffin by it selfe, & that at MEGARA they dyd put three or source corses too the Abse. gether. They saye also there were certaine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which dyd greatly helpe Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their strife was judged by five Arbitrators, all Spartans borne: that is to faye, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypfechidas, Anaxilas, & Cleomenes. Solon vindoutedly wonne great glory & honour by this exployte, yet was he much more honoured & esteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the teple of Apollo, in the cittie of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be suffered, that the CYRRHEIANS should at their pleasure abuse the sanctuarie of the oracle, & that they should ayde the D B L-PHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the counsell of the Amphittyons, being moued with his words and perfuations, proclaimed warres against the CYRRHEIANS; R as divers other doe witnesse, and specially Aristotle, in the storie he wrote of those that wanne the Pythian games, where he ascribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination . Neuertheles Hermippus fayeth, Solon was not made generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Afchines the Orator wrote no fuch thing of him: & in the chronicles of the DELPHIANS they finde, that one Alemeon, & not Solon, was the generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the cittie of Athen's had a long time benevexed and troubled through Cylons heynous offence, euer sence the yere that Megaeles (gouernour of the cittie of ATHENS) dyd with faver words handle so the confederates of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken sanctuarie within the liberties of the temple of Minerua: that he persuaded them to be wise, and to present them felues before the judges, holding by a threede, which they should tye about the base of the C image of the goddesse where she stoode, bicause they should not lose their libertie. But when they were come to the place of the honorable goddeffes fo called (which be the images of the furies) comming downe to present them selves before the judges, the threede brake of it self. Then Megacles, and other officers his copanions, layed holde on them presently, saying that it was a manifest signe that the goddesse Minerua refused to saue the. So those they tooke, & all they could laye hands of, were immediately stoned to death without the cittie-the rest which tooke the altars for refuge, were flaine there also. And none were faued, but such as had made meanes to the gouernours wives of the citie, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, and commonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the issues of the rebelles that rose with Cylon, chaunced to rise again in credit, & growing D to great authoritie, they neuer left quarrelling & fighting continually with thoffpring of Megaeles. These factions were greatest highest in Solons time: who being of authoritie, & seeing the people thus divided in two parts the ftepped in betweene them, with the chiefest men of ATHENS, & did so persuade & intreate those whom they called the abiects & excomunicates, that they were contented to be judged. So three hundred of the chiefest cittizens were chosen iudges to heare this matter. The accuser was Myron Phlyeian. This matter was heard and pleaded, & by sentece of the judges, the excommunicates were condened. Those that were aliue, to perpetuall exile: & the bones of them that were dead, to be digged vp, & throwen out of the confines of the territorie of ATHENS. But whileft the cittie of ATHENS Was occupied with these vprores, the MEGARIANS wisely caught holde of the occasion deliuered, and set E vpon the Althenians, tooke fro them the hauen of Nys EA, & recoursed againe out of their handes, the Ile of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the cittie was possessed with a certen superstitious feare: for some sayed, that sprites were come againe, and straunge sightes were seene. The prognosticatours also fayed, they perceived by their facrifices, the cittie was defiled with fome abhominable & wicked things, which were of necessitie to be purged and throwen out.

Frimenides Periander.

Hereupon they fent into CRETA for Epimenides Phastian, whom they reckoned the feuenth ken for one of of the wife men, at the least fuch as will not allowe Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuoute man, and very wife in celeftiall things, by infpiration from aboue: by reason whereof, men of his time called him the newe Curetes, that is to fave, Prophet: and he was thought the sonne of a Nymphe called Balte. When he was come to Athens, and growen F in friendshippe with Solon: he dyd helpe him much, and made his waye for establishing of his lawes . For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their facrifices much lighter, and of

A leffe coste: & brought the cittizes to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting of cerraine seuere and barbarous ceremonies, which the most parte of the women observed in their mourning, & he ordeined certain facrifices which he would have done immediately after the: obsequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the rest was, that by vsing the cittizes vnto holines & deuotion, daylie facrifices, prayers vnto the godds, purging of them selues, & huble offerings: he wanne mens hartes by litle & litle, to yelde them more confirmable to inflice. & to be more inclined to cocorde & vnity. It is reported also that Epimenides, whe he saw the hauen of Munychia, & had long conidered of it: told those about him, that men were very blinde in foreseeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS (sayed he)knew, what hurt this hauen would bring the: they would eate it (as they faye) with their teethe. It is fayed also that Thales did pro-B gnosticate such a like thing, who after his deathe commaunded they should burie his bodie, in some vile place of no reckoning, with in the territorie of the MILESIANS, saying that one dave there should be the place of a cittie. Epimenides therfore being maruelously esteemed of every man for these causes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great presents of money and other things, but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to geue. him a boughe of the holy olyue: which they graunted him, and so he returned shortely home?

into CRETA. Nowe that this fedition of Cylon was veterly appealed in ATHENS, for that the Solon pacified excommunicates were banished the countrie: the citty fell againe into their oldetroubles and the sedition partes and factions, as there were people of fundry places & territories within the countrie of

C ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines, the people of the vallies, and the peodiffentions about the government of the common weale: & they were deuided into so divers at Athens, ple of the sea coaste. Those of the mountaines, tooke the comon peoples parte for their lines. Those of the valley, would a sewe of the best cittizens should carie the swaye. The coaste menwould, that neither of the should preuaile, bicause they would have had a meane governmet,' & mingled of them both. Furthermore, the faction betwene the poore & riche, proceeding of their vnequalitie, was at that time very great. By reason whereof the cittle was in great daunger, and it feemed there was no waye to pacifie or take vp thefe controuerfies, vnles fome tyraunt happened to rife, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For all the comon people were so fore indetted to the riche, that either they plowed their landes, & yelded them the fixt "The miseries parte of their croppe: (for which cause they were called Hettemory and servants) or els they of den. and D borowed money of them at vsurie, vpon gage of their bodies to serve it out. And if they were , vsmie. not able to paye them, then were they by the law deliuered to their creditours, who kept them as bonde men & flaues in their houses, or els they sent them into straunge coutries to be sold:

& many euen for very pouertie were forced to fell their owne children for there was no lawe. to forbid the contrarie) or els to forfake their cittie & countrie, for the extreme cruelty & hard ... dealing of these abominable vsurers their creditours. Insomuch as many of the lustiest & stow-... test of them, banded together in copanies, & incoraged one another, not to suffer & beare any lenger such extremitie, but to choose them a stowte & trusty captaine, that might set them at libertie, and redeeme those out of captiuity, which were judged to be bondmen & servants, for lacke of paying of their detts at their dayes appointed: & so to make againe a newe division of E all landes and tenements, and wholy to chaunge and turne vp the whole state & gouernment, Then the wifest men of the cittie, who sawe Solon only neither partner with the riche in their oppression, neither partaker with the poore in their necessitie: made suteto him, that it would Solons equision please him to take the matter in hande, & to appease and pacific all these broyles and sedition) and varights Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he vsed a subtiltie, whereby he deceived both the one and the other fide, concerning the comon weale. For he fecretly promifed the poore to deuide the Solon by fublandsagaine: & the riche also, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. How soeuer it fell out, thin fer water the the end he was chosen gouernour after Philobrotus, & was made reformer of the rigour of the Solon chosen F lawes, & the teperer of the state & como weale, by cosent & agreemet of both parties. The rich' reformer of accepted him, bicause he was no begger: the poore did also like him, bicause he was an honest man. They saye moreouer, that one word & sentece which he spake (which at that present was now, Thus the captaines of both factions perfuaded & prayed him, boldly to take vpon him that foueraigne authoritie. fithence he had the whole cittle nowe at his commaundement. The neawters also of energy parte, when they fawe it very harde to pacifie these things with lawe and reason, were well content that the wifest, and honestest man, should alone have the royall power in his handes. Some fave also that there was such an oracle of Apollo.

Solons aunfrer for tyrannie.

Sale refuseth then a beast, if for feare of the name of tyranne, he would refuse to take upon him a Kingdome: which is the most just and honorable state, if one take it your him that is an honest man. As in olde time, Tynnondas made him felfe King of those of Negrepont, with their confent: and as Pittaeus was then prefently of those of METELIN. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they saye he aunswered his friendes, that principalitie and tyrannie, was in deede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, whe he was once entered into it. And in certen verses that he wrote C to Phocus, thus he faved:

Ineither blushe nor yet revent my felfe. that have preserude my native soyle allowayes. and that therein (to hourde up trashe and pelfe) no tyrants thought, could once eclypfe my prayfe. No might could move my minde to any veronge. wwhich might beblot the glory of my name: for fo I thought to live in honour longe; and farre excell all other men for fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablish D newe lawes: he was then of great countenaunce and authoritie. But he him felfe writeth, that many fayed of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyrannie:

Suer, Solon vvas a foole, and of a bashefull minde, that vvould refuse the great good happe, vvhich goddes to him assignde. The praye vvas in his handes yet durst he neuer dravve. the net therefore: but stoode abasht and like a dastarde day ve. For had not that so bene, he would for one dayes raigne, to be a King in Athens towne)him felfe (all quicke)haue flayen. And eke subverted guyte his familie vvithall,

So sovete it is to rule the roste, yelad in princely pall. Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Nowe, notwithstanding he had refused the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remisse nor softe therefore in gouerning, neither would he bowe for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking, that had chosen him their reformer. For where the mischief was tollerable, he dyd not straight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither dyd he so chauge the state, as he might have done, least if he should have attempted to turne vpsidowne thewhole government, he might afterwards have bene neuer able to fettle & stablishe the same againe. Therefore he only altered that, which he thought by reason he would persuade his cittizens vnto, or els by sorce he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he faied, fower with sweete, & force with instice. And herewith agreeth his aunswer that he made afterwards, vnto one that asked him, if he had made the best F lawes he could for the Athenian styea fuer, fayeth he, fuch as they were to receive. And this that followeth alfo, they have ever fince observed in the Athenian togue: to make certe things

A pleasaunt, that be hatefull, finely conveying them under culler of pleasing names. As calling Things hatewhores, lemans:taxes, contributions: garrifons, gardes: prisones, houses. And all this came full made vp first by Solons inuetion, who called cleering of detts, Seifachtheian: in English, discharge. For with Greene the first chaunge & reformation he made in gouernment was this the ordeined that all manner worder. of detts past should be cleere, and no bodye should aske his detter any thing for the time past. Cleering of detts. Solow That no man should thenceforth lende money out to vsurie, vpon couenants for the bodye to fift lane. bebounde, if it were not repayed. Howbeit some write (as Androtion among other) that the Visite for-poore were coteted that the interest only for viury should be moderated, without taking away gage of the the whole dett: & that Solon called this easie & gentle discharge, Seifachtheian, with crying vp bodie. the value of money. For he raised the pound of filter, being before but three score and thirtene The value of B Drachmes, full vp to an hundred : fo they which were to paye great fummes of money, payed appy Solon. by tale as much as they ought, but with leffe number of peces then the dett could have bene payed when it was borowed. And so the detters gayned much, & the creditours lost nothing. Neuertheles the more parte of them which have written the same, saye, that this crying vp of money, was a generall discharge of all detts, conditions, & couenaunts vpon the same: whereto the very Poemes them felues, which Solon wrote, doe feeme to agree. For he glorieth, & breaketh forth in his verses, that he had taken away all bawkes & marcks, that separated mens lands through the countrie of ATTICA: & that now he had fet at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the cittizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of payment of their dettes had bene condened for flaues to their creditours, he had brought many home again out of strauge C contries, where they had bene fo long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall tongue: &other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had nowe fet them all at good libertie. But while he was a doing this, men faye a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruelously. For having framed an Edict for clearing of all detts, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, Letter would and togetie it some prety presace, that otherwise was ready to be proclaymed: he opened him be kept series selfes somewhat to certaine of his familiers whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) will have be sublished. & tolde them how he would not medle with landes and possessions, but would only cleere and cut of all maner of detts. These men before the proclamation came out, went presently to the 114 conscienmoney men, & borowed great summes of money of them, & layed it out straight vpon lade. So et by orafi when the proclamation came out, they kept the landes they had purchased, but restored not present laws.

D the money they had borowed. This fowle parte of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of & wrogfully blamed: as if he had not only fuffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong, & injustice, Notwithstading he cleared him self of this slaunderous reporte, losing fine talents by his owne lawe. For it was well knowen that so much was due vnto him, & he was the first that following Agood lawehis owne proclamation, dyd clearely release his detters of the same . Other saye he was owing maker, beginfifteene talents: and among the same, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it . Notwithstanding they euer after called Solons friendes, Greocopides, cutters of detts. This lawe neither liked the one nor the other forte. For it greatly offended the riche, for cancelling their bondes: and it much more milliked the poore, bicause all landes and possessions they gaped for, were

E LACED & MONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleventh descended of the right line from Hercules, & had manyyeres bene king of LACED & MON, where he had gotten great authoritie. & made him felf many friends: all which things together, dyd greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wifely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet also, he vsed more persuasion then force, a good witnes thereof, the losse of his eye: preferring a lawe before his private iniurie, which hath power to preserue a cittie long in vnion and concorde, and to make cittizens to be neither poore nor riche. Solon could not attain to this, for he was born in a popular state, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had. as one feeking to winne no credit with his cittizes, but onely by his counfaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the more parte of the cittie, by his proclamation which he made:he him felf doth F witnesse it, saying:

Some fave also that there was such an oracle of Apollo.

Sitt thou at helme, as governour to fleere to guyde our course, and rule the rowvling shippe, for thou shalt fee, full many Athenians there, will take thy parte, and after thee will trippe.

But his familier friendes aboue all rebuked him, saying he was to be accompted no better Sold refusith then a beast, if for feare of the name of tyranne, he would refuse to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the most just and honorable state, if one take it vpon him that is an honest man. As in olde time, Tynnondas made him felfe King of those of Negrepont, with their confent : and as Pittacus was then presently of those of METELIN . friendes, that principalitie and tyrannie, was in deede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, whe he was once entered into it. And in certen verses that he wrote C to Phocus, thus he fayed: Ineither blushe, nor yet repent my felfe, that have preserude my native soyle allowayes, and that therein (to hourde uptrashe and pelfe) no tyrants thought, could once eclypse my prayse. No might could move, my minde to any voronge, which might beblot, the glory of my name: for fo Ithought to live in honour longe, and farre excell all other men for fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablish D newe lawes: he was then of great countenaunce and authoritie. But he him felfe writeth, that many fayed of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyrannie:

Suer, Solon vvas a foole, and of a bashefull minde, that would refuse the great good happe, which goddes to him assignde. The praye vvas in his handes, yet durst he neuer drawve. the net therefore: but stoode abasht, and like a dastarde dayve. For had not that so bene, he would for one dayes raigne, to be a King in Athens towne)him felfe (all quicke)haue flaven. And eke subuerted quyte his familie withall, So sweete it is to rule the roste, yelad in princely pall.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Nowe, notwithstanding he had refused the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remisse nor softe therefore in gouerning, neither would he bowe for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking, that had chosen him their reformer. For where the mischief was tollerable, he dyd not straight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither dyd he so chauge the state, as he might haue done, least if he should have attempted to turne vpsidowne the whole government, he might afterwards have bene neuer able to settle & stablishe the same againe. Therefore he only altered that, which he thought by reason he would persuade his cittizens vnto, or els by sorce he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he faied, sower with sweete, & force with instice. And herewith agreeth his aunswer that he made afterwards, vnto one that asked him, if he had made the best F lawes he could for the Athenians?yea fuer, fayeth he, fuch as they were to receive. And this that followeth alfo, they have ever fince observed in the Athenian togue: to make certe things pleafaunt

And all this came full made vp first by Solons inuetion, who called cleering of detts, Seifachtheian: in English, discharge. For with succession the first chaunge & reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordeined that all manner wordes. of detts past thould be cleere, and no bodye should aske his detter any thing for the time past. Howbeit some write (as Androtion among other) that the Vinite forpoore were coteted that the interestonly for viury should be moderated, without taking away gage of the

the whole dett: & that Solon called this easie & gentle discharge, Seisachtheian, with crying vp bodie the value of money. For he raised the pound of filtuer, being before but three score and thirtene The value of B Drachmes, full vp to an hundred : fo they which were to paye great fummes of money, payed who solon by tale as much as they ought, but with lesse number of peces then the dett could have bene payed when it was borowed. And so the detters gayned much, & the creditours lost nothing. Nevertheles the more parte of them which have written the fame, faye, that this crying vp of money, was a generall discharge of all detts, conditions, & couenaunts voon the same: whereto the very Poemes them felues, which Solon wrote, doe feeme to agree. For he glorieth, & breaketh forth in his verses, that he had taken away all bawkes & marcks, that separated mens lands through the countrie of ATTICA: & that now he had fet at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the cittizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of payment of their dettes had bene condened for flaues to their creditours, he had brought many home again out of strafige C coutries, where they had bene so long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall tongue: & other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had nowe fet them all at good libertie. But while he was a doing this, men faye a thing thwarted him, that troubled him marueloufly. For having framed an Edict for clearing of all detts, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, Lawer would and to gene it some prety preface, that otherwise was ready to be proclaymed: he opened him be kept secret felfe somewhat to certaine of his familiers whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) will they be set tolde them how he would not medle with landes and possessions by the second possessions of the second possessions.

& tolde them how he would not medle with landes and possessions, but would only cleere and cut of all maner of detts. These men before the proclamation came out, went presently to the 111 conficienmoneymen, & borowed great fummes of money of them, & layed it out straight vpon lade. So ces by craft when the proclamation came out, they kept the landes they had purchased, but restored not present lane. the money they had borowed. This fowle parte of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of & wrogfully blamed; as if he had not only suffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong, & iniustice.

Notwithstading he cleared him self of this slaunderous reporte, losing fine talents by his owne lawe. For it was well known that so much was due vnto him, & he was the first that following his owne proclamation, dyd clearely release his detters of the same. Other saye he was owing maker, beginfifteene talents: and among the same, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithstanding they ever after called Solons friendes, Greocopides, cutters of detts. This lawe neither liked the one nor the other forte. For it greatly offended the riche, for cancelling their bondes: and it much more milliked the poore, bicause all landes and possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, & every bodye a like riche and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the E LACED EMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleventh descended of the right line from Hercules, & had many yeres bene king of LACED & MON, where he had gotten great authoritie, & made him felf many friends: all which things together, dyd greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wifely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet also, he vsed more persuasion then force, a good witnesthereof, the loffe of his eye: preferring a lawe before his private iniurie, which hath power to preserue a cittie long in vnion and concorde, and to make cittizens to be neither poore nor riche. Solon could not attain to this, for he was born in a popular state, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did whathe could possible, with the power he had, as one feeking to winne no credit with his cittizes, but onely by his counfaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the more parte of the cittie, by his proclamation which he made: he him felf doth nor still their braynes, which worought like windes. But shortely after, having a feeling of the benefit of his ordinaunce, and every one forgetting his private quarrell: they altogether made a common facrifice, which they called the facrifice of Seifachthia, or discharge, and chose Solon generall reformer of the lawe, and of the R lua authority whole state of the comon weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will. As the offices of state, common affemblies, voyces in election, judgemets in instice, and the bodie of the Senate. And they gave him also full power and authoritie, to selfe and taxe any of them, to appointe the number, what time the feffe should continewe, and to keepe, confirme, and difanull at his pleasure, any of the auncient lawes and customes then in being. To beginne withall, he first tooke away all Dracons bloudy lawes, sauing for murder, and demned for idlenes, were judged to dye. And pety larceny, as robbing mens horteyards, & gardens of fruite, or erbes, was as seuerely punished: as those who had committed facriledge or C

Demades therefore encountered it pleasauntly, when he saved: that Dracons lawes were not written with incke, but with bloud, And Draco him selfe being asked one daye, why his punishmets were so vnequall, as death for all kinde of faultes: he aunswered. Bicause he thought the least offence worthie so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being desirous to haue the chief offices of the cittie to remaine in riche mens handes, as already they dyd, and yet to mingle the authoritie of gouernment in such forte, as Solon rateth enerie citti-

the meaner people might beare a little swaye, which they neuer could before: he made an estimate of the goodes of euery private cittizen. And those which he founde verely worthe five hundred builhells of corne, & other liquide fruites and vpwards, he called Pentacosiomedimnes: as to fave, fine hundred buffhell men of renenue. And those that had three hundred buffhells a D yere, and were able to keepe a horse of seruice, he put in the second degree, and called them knightes. They that might dispend but two hundred busshells avere, were put in the thirde place,& called Zengites. All other vnder those, were called Theres, as ye would saye, hyerlings, or craftes men liuing of their labour: whom he dyd not admit to beare any office in the cittie. neither were they taken as free cittizens, fauing they had voyces in elections, and affemblies of the cittie, and in judgements, where the people wholy judged. This at the first seemed nothing, but afterwardes they felt it was to great purpose: for hereby the most parte of private quarrells and strifes that grewe among them, were in the ende layed open before the people. For he suffered those to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong judgement in their causes. Furthermore, bicause his lawes were written somewhat obscurely, and might E be diverfely taken and interpreted: this dyd geue a great deale more authoritie and power to the iudges. For, confidering all their controuerfies could not be ended, and iudged by expresse lawe: they were driuen of necessitie allwayes to ronne to the judges, and debated their matters before them. In so muche as the judges by this meanes came to be somewhat about the lawe: for they dyd euen expounde it as they would them felues. Solon felf doth note this equall diuision of the publicke authoritie, in a place of his poesses, where he sayeth, Suche pouver haue I genen to common peoples hande, as might become their meane estate, with equity to stande: and as I have not pluct from them their dignitie, so have I not to much increast their small authoritie. Vnto theriche likewvise. I have allowved no more, then well might feeme (in just conceit) sufficient for their store.

And so I have for both provided in such vvise, that neither shall eche other vivrong nor seeme for to despise. Yet considering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common forte of people: he suffered any man that would, to take upon him the defence, of any poore mans case that had the wrong. For if a man were hurte, beaten, forced, or otherwise wronged: any other man that would, might lawfully fue the offendour, and profecute lawe against him. And this was a wise lawe ordeined of him, to accustome his cittizens to be sorie one for anothers hurte . & so to feele it as if any parte of his owne bodie had bene injured. And they fave he made an aunfwer on a time agreable to this law. For being asked what cittle he thought belt gouerned he aunswered. That cittie where such as receyue no wronge, doe as earnestly defend wrog offered B to other, as the very wrong & injurie had bene done vnto them selues. He erected also the cou-faill of the Areopagites, of those magistrates of the cittie, out of which they did yerely choose their gouernour & he him felf had bene of that number, for that he had bene gouernour for a The counfell vere. Wherfore perceyuing now the people were growen to a stomake, & hawtines of minde, of the bicause they were cleare discharged of their detts: he set one up for matters of state, another counsell of an hundred chosen out of euery tribe, whereof soure hundred of them were to con- 2 counsells efult & debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great refled in Acounsell of the people at large should be assembled, no matters should be put forth, onles it them. had bene before well confidered of, & digefted, by the counfell of the foure hundred. Moreouer, he ordeined the higher courte should hauethe chiefe authoritie & power ouer all things.

C and chiefly to fee the lawe executed and mainteined: supposing that the common weale being fettled, and ftayed with these two courtes (as with two stronge anker holdes) it should be the leffe turmoyled and troubled, and the people also better pacified and quieted. The most parte of writers holde this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the counfaill of the Areapagites, as we have fayed, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his lawes and ordinaunces made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but allwayes speaketh to the Ephetes (which were judges of life and death) when he spake of murder, or of any mans death. Notwithstanding, the eight law of the thirtenth table of Solon sayeth thus, in these very words. All fuch as have bene banished or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his laws, shalbe other lawer restored agains to their goodes and good name, except those which were condemned by or- of Solon.

D der of the counfaill of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open courte, for murder, and death of any man, or for aspiring to vsurpe tyrannie. These wordes to the contrarie feeme to proue and testifie, that the counsell of the Areopagites was before Solon was chofen reformer of the lawes. For howe could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the counsell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the first that gaue it authoritie to iudge?onles a man will fave peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obscure and darke, and would supply that they lacked, with expounding of the fame by them . Those which shalbe founde attainted and conuicted of any matter , that hath bene heard before the counfaill of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the governours of the cittie when this lawe shall come forth: shall stand condemned still, and all other shalbe pardoned, F. restored, and set at libertie. Howsoeuer it is, sure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore amongest the rest of his lawes, one of them in deede was of his owne denise; for the like was neuer stablished els where. And it is that lawe, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnho-nest, who in a civil vprore among the cittizens, sitteth still a looker on, and a neawter, and ta- gainst nearketh parte with neither fide. Whereby his minde was as it should appeare, that private men training should not be only carefull to put them selues & their causes in safety, nor yet should be careles for others mens matters, or thincke it a vertue not to medle with the miseries and misfortunes of their countrie, but from the beginning of every fedition that they should in every fedition that they should in the second with those that take the justest cause in hande, and rather to hazarde them selues with such. then to tarie looking (without putting them felues in daunger) which of the two should haue F the victorie. There is another lawe also, which at the first sight me thinketh is very vnhonest in attention and fond. That if any man according to the lawe hath matched with a riche heire & inheritour, and of him felfe is impotent, and vnable to doe the office of a husband, the maye law-that it is a wife made lawe for those, which knowing them selues vnmeete to entertaine wedlocke, will for conetournes of landes, marye with riche heires and possessioners, and minde to abuse poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of lawe: and will thincke to force and restraine nature. For, seeing the lawe suffereth an inheritour or possessioner thus ill bestowed, at her pleasure to be bolde with any of her husbands kynne: men will either leaue to purchase such mariages, or if they be so careles that they will nedes marye, it shalbe to their extreme shame and ignominie, and so shall they deservedly paye for their greedy couetousnes. And the lawe is well made also, bicause the wife hath not scope to all her husbands kynsemen, but vnto one choyce man whom she liketh best of his house: to the ende that the children that shalbe borne, shalbe at the least of her husbands bloude and kynred. This also confirmeth the same, B that fuch a newe marved wife should be shut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him : and that he also which maryeth such an inheritour, should of duety see her thryse a moneth at the least. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honour the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honest woman, that he loueth her, and that he esteemeth of her. Besides, it taketh awaye many mislikings and displeasures which oftentimes happen in such cases, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it dyenot ytterly be-Solon forbid. tweene them. Furthermore, he tooke awaye all joynters and downes in other mariages, and dethipiniters willed that the wives should bring their husbands but three gownes only, with some other litle moueables of small value, and without any other thing as it were: vtterly forbidding that they should buye their husbands, or that they should make marchaundise of mariages, C as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman should marye together for iffue, for pleasure, and for loue, but in no case for money . And for proofe hereof, Dionysius the tyranne of Sicile, one daye aunswered his mother (which would needes be maried to a young man of Syracvsa) in this forte. I have power (faieth he) to breake the lawes of Sy-RACVSA, by having the Kingdome: but to force the law of nature, or to make mariage without the reasonable compasse of age, that passeth my reache and power. So is it not tolerable, and much leffe allowable also, that such disorder should be in well ordered citties, that such

And finding a young man in an olde riche womans house, getting his liuing by riding of her errants, and waxing fat as they faye the partridge doth by treading of the hennes: he maye take him from thence, to bestowe him on some young mayde that shall have neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another lawe of Solons. A Les fabid. which forbiddeth to speake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke, that they ought not to touche the dead, no more than to touche holy things: and men should take great heede to offende those that are departed out of this world, besides it is a token of wise- E dome and civillitie, to beware of immortall enemies. He commaunded also in the selfe same lawe, that no man should speake ill of the liuing, specially in Churches, during diuine seruice, or in counfaill chamber of the cittie, nor in the Theaters whilest games were a playing : you payne of three filuer *Drachmes to be payed to him that was injured,& two to the common treasurie. For he thought it to much shameles boldnes, in no place to keepe in ones choller, and moreouer, that fuch lacked civillitie and good manners; and yet altogether to suppresse and smother it, he knewe it was not only a harde matter, but to some natures vnpossible. And he that maketh lawes, must have regarde to the common possibilitie of men, if he will punishe litle, with profitable example, and not much without some profit. So was he marue-Mass for bourly well thought of, for the lawe that he made touching willes and testaments. For before, F men might not lawfully make their heires whom they would, but the goodes came to the childre or kynred of the testatour. But he leauing it at libertie, to dispose their goods where

A they thought good, so they had no children of their owne: dyd therein preferre friendship before kynred, and good will and fauour before necessitie and constrainte, and so made every one lorde and mafter of his owne goodes. Yet he dyd not fimply and a like allowe all fortes of giftes, howfoeuer they were made: but those only which were made by men of found memorie or by those whose wittes fayled them not by extreme sicknes, or through drincks, medicines, poylonings, charmes, or other fuch violence and extraordinarie meanes, neither ver through the intifements and perfuafions of women. As thincking very wifely, there was no difference at all betweene those that were euidently forced by constraint, and those that were compassed and wrought by subornation at length to doe a thing against their will, taking fraude in this case equall with violence, and pleasure with sorowe, as passions with mad-B nes, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to drawe and drive men from reason. He made another lawe also, in which he appointed women their times to goe abroade into the fieldes, their mourning, their feaftes and facrifices, plucking from them all di- Alare for forder and wilfull libertie, which they vied before. For he dyd forbid that they should carie abroade. out of the cittle with them aboue three gownes, and to take vittells with them aboue the value of an halfe pennie, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite highe; and specially he dyd forbid them to goe in the night, other then in their coche, and that a torche should be carried before them. He dyd forbid them also at the buriall of the dead, to teare and spoyle them felues with blowes, to make lamentations in verfes, to weepe at the funeralles of a straunger not being their kinseman, to sacrifice an oxe on the graue of the dead, to burie aboue three C gownes with the corfe, to goe to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corfe: all which or the most parte of them, are forbidden by our lawes at this daye. Moreouer, those lawes appointe a penaltie vpon fuch women as offend in the fame, to be diffrayned for, by certaine officers expressely named, to controll and reforme the abuses of women, as womanish persones and faynte harted, which suffer them selves to be overcome with such passions and fondnes in their mourning. And perceyuing that the cittle of ATHEN'S beganne to replenish daylie more and more, by mens repayring thither from all partes, and by reason of the great affured fafetie, and libertie that they founde there: and also considering howe the greatest parte of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffeking the feas, are not wonte to bring any marchaundife to those, which can geue them nothing a-D gaine in exchaunge: he beganne to practife that his cittizens should give them selves vnto craftes and occupations, and made a lawe, that the fonne should not be bounde to relieue his craftes and father being olde, onles he had fet him in his youth to some occupation. It was a wife parte of occupations Lycurgus (who dwelt in a cittie where was no reforte of straungers, and had so great a territorie as could have furnished twife as many people, as Euripides sayeth, and moreover on all fides was enuironned with a great number of flaues of the I L o T Es, whom it was needefull to keepe still in labour and worcke continually) to haue his cittizens allwayes occupied in exer-cifes of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other science, but discharged them of all other milerable occupations and handy craftes. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, & not things vnto lawes, when he fawe the countrie of ATTICA fo leane and barren, matrimonie, plainely sheweth that he tooke not a wife to have children, but only to satisfie his luft and pleafure: and fo fuch an one hath his just reward, and is disapointed of the reue-

F rece that a father ought to have of his children, since through his owne faulte the birth of his

E that it could hardely bring forth to fusteine those that tilled the grounde only, and therefore much more impossible to keepe so great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requisite to set vp occupations, and to geue them countenaunce and estimation. Therefore he ordeined, that the counfaill of the Areopagites, should have full power, and The country authoritie to enquier how every man lived in the cittie, & also to punishe such as they found rive of the idle people, and dyd not labour. But this was thought to seuere and straight a lawe which he countaile of ordeined (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlotts and the Arespastrumpers should not be bounde to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of give.

childe falleth out to his reproche. Yet to fave truely, in Solons laws touching women, there are many obfurdities, as they fall out ill fauoredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the facte. But he that rauisheth or forcibly taketh awaye a free wo-A man, is only condemned to paye a hundred filuer * drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, should only paye twenty drachmes. Onlesshe had bene a common strumpetor curtifan: for fuch doe iustefy open accesse, to all that will hier them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any persone to sell his daughters or sisters, onles the father or brother had taken them, abufing them selues before mariage. Me thincketh it is farre from purpose and reason, with seueritie to punish a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to passe it ouer in another: or to set some light fine on ones head for a great faulte, and after to discharge him, as it were but a matter of sporte. Onles they will excuse it thus, that money being very harde & scante at that time in ATHENS, those fines were then very great & grieuous to paye. For in setting out the charges of offerings which should be made in sacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a convenient B offering, and he setteth a busshell of come at a silver drachme. More he ordeined, that they which wonne any of the games at Athens, should payeto the common treasurie an hundred drachmes . And those that wone any of the games Olympicall, fine hudred drachmes. Also he appointed that he which brought a he woulfe, should have five drachmes, & him one drachme for reward of a she woulfe. Whereof as Demetrius Phalerian writeth: the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordeined in the fixtenth table of his lawes mete for burnt sacrifices, it is likely he dydrate them at a much higher price, then ordinarilie they were worth: and yet not withstanding, the price which he setteth, is very litle in comparison of that which they are worth at this daye. Nowe it was a custome ener amongest the Athenians to kill their woulfes, bicause all their coutrie laye for pasture, & not for C. tillage. Some there be that faye, the tribes of the people of ATHEN'S haue not bene called afthe Athenia ter the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hathbene: but that they were called after their divers trades & manners of living, which they tooke them felues vnto from the beginning. For, such as gaue them selues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would faye, men of armes. Those that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to faye, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, & followed the plough, were called Teleontes: as you would fave, labouring men. And those that kept beaftes & cattell, were called Agicores: as much to faye, as heard men. Nowe, for a fmuch as the whole prouince of ATT ICA was very drye, and had great lacke of water, being not full of rivers, ronning streames, nor lakes, nor yet stored with any great nuber of springs, insomuch as they are D drinen there to vie (through the most parte of the countrie)water drawen out of welles made with mens handes: he made such an order, that where there was any well within the space of an Hippicon, that euery bodye within that circuite, might come and drawe water onely at that well, for his vie and necessitie. Hippicon is the distaunce of foure surlonges, which is halfe a mile: & those that dwelt further of, should goe seeke their water inother places where they would. But if they had digged tenne yardes deepe in their grounde, and could finde no water in the bottome, in this case, they might lawfully goe to their next neighbours well, and take a pot full of water conteining fix gallons, twife a daye: judging it great reason that neceffitie should be holpen, but not that idlenes should be cherished. He appointed also the spaces that should be kept & observed by those, that would set or plant trees in their ground, E planting and as being a man very skilfull in these matters. For he ordered, that whosoeuer would plante serving of any kynde of trees in his grounde he should serve the first the whosoeuer would plante any kynde of trees in his grounde, he should set them fine soote a sonder one from another: but for the figge tree and olyuetree specially, that they should in any case be nine soote a sonder, bicause these two trees doe spread out their branches sarre of, & they cannot stand neere other trees, but they must needes hurte them very much. For besides that they drawe awaye the same that doth nourishe the other trees, they cast also a certaine moisture & steame vpon them, that is very hurtefull & incomodious. More he ordeined, that who foeuer would digge a pytte or hole in his grounde, he should digge it as farre of from his neighbours pyt, as the pytte he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would fet vp a hiue of bees in his grounde, he (hould fet them at the least three hundred foote from other hines fet about him F before. And of the fruites of the earth, he was contented they should transporte and sell only oyle out of the Realme to straungers, but no other fruite or graine. He ordeined that the go-

A uernour of the cittle should yerely proclaime open curses against those that should doe to the contrarie, or els he him selse making default therein, should be fined at a hundred drachmes. Drachme. This ordinaunce is in the first table of Solon lawes, and therefore we maye not altogether difcredit those which saye, they did forbid in the olde time that men should carie figges out of the countrie of ATTIC A, and that from thence it came that these picke thanckes, which bewrave & accuse them that transported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another lawe also against the hurte that beastes might doe ynto men. Wherein he ordeined that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him should deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tyed to a logge of timber of foure cubites longe: & this was a very good deuife, to make men fafe from dogges. But he was very straight in one lawe he made, that no straunger might be made deni-R zen and free man of the cittle of ATHENS, onles he were a banished man for ever out of his countrie, or els that he should come & dwell there with all his familie, to exercise some crafte or science. Notwithstanding, they saye he made not this lawe so much to put straungers from there freedome there, as to drawe them thither, affuring them by this ordinaunce, they might come and be free of the cittie: and he thought moreouer, that both the one & the other would be more faithfull to the common weale of ATHENS. The one of them, for that against their willes they were driven to forfake their countrie: & the other forte, for that advisedly and willingly they were contented to forfake it. This also was another of Solons lawes, which he orderned for those that should feast certe dayes at the towne house of the cittie, at other mens cost. For he would not allow, that one man should come often to feasts there. And if any man were Feasts for C inuited thither to the feast, and dyd refuse to come: he dyd set a fine on his head, as reprouing townes men in the miserable niggardlines of the one, and the presumptuous arrogancy of the other, to conteinne & despile common order. After he had made his lawes, he dyd stablishe them to continewe for the space of one hundred yeres, and they were written in tables of wood called Axo-Axones. nes, which were made more long then broade, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine some monuments yet in our time, which are to be seene in the towne hall of the cittie of AT HENS. Aristotle fayeth, that these tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus also the Comi- Cyrbes. call poet fayeth in one place, of Solon & Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veffell or panne wherein they dyd frye millet or hirse. Howbeit others saye, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which conteined the ordinaunces of the facrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the D common weale. So, all the counsels & magistrates together dyd sweare, that they would kepe Solons lawes them felues, & also cause them to be observed of others throughly & particularly. Then euery one of the Thesmothetes (which were certaine officers attedaunt on the counsell, & had speciall charge to see the lawes observed) dyd solenly sweare in the open market place, neere the stone where the proclamations are proclaimed; and enery of them, both promised, & vowed openly to keepe the same lawes, & that if any of them dyd in any one pointe breake the faid ordinaunces, then they were content that fuch offender should paye to the temple of Apollo, at the cittle of DELPHES, an image of fine golde, that should wave as much as him felf. Moreouer Solon feeing the diforder of the moneths, & the moung of the moone, which followed not the course of the sunne, & vsed not to rise & fall when the sunne doth, but oftetimes E in one daye, it doth both touche & passe the sunne : he was the first that called the chaunge of the moone, Ene cai néa, as much to faye, as olde and newe moone. Allowing that which appeared before the conjunction, to be of the moneth past: & that which shewed it self after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the first also (in my opinion) that vnderstoode Homer rightly, when he fayed then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the chaunge, he called Neomenia, as much to faye, as the newe moneth, or the newe moone, After the twenty day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckaned not the rest of the moneth, as increasing, but as in the wane: & gathered it by seing the light of the moone decreasing vntill the thirtie day. Now after his lawes were come abroade, & proclaimed, there came some daylie vnto him, which either praised them, or misliked them. & prayed him either F to take awaye, or to adde fome thing vnto them. Many againe came & asked him, howe he vnderstoode some sentece of his lawes: & requested him to declare his meaning, & how it should be taken. Wherefore confidering howe it were to no purpose to resuse to doe it, and againe howe it would get him much enuie & ill will to yelde thereunto he determined (happen what A would) to winde him selfe out of these bryars, and to siye the gronings, complaints, and quarrells of his cittizens. For he fayeth him felfe:

Full harde it is all mindes content to have. and specially in matters harde and grave.

So, to conuey him felf a while out of the waye, he tooke vpon him to be mafter of a shippe in a certaine voyage, and asked licence for tenne yeres of the ATHENIANS to goe beyond fea. hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his lawes, So went he to the seas, & the first place of his arrivall was in É GYPT, where he remained a while, as he him self fayeth. Euen there where Nylus, with his crooked cranckes by Canobe falles into the fea banckes. He went to his booke there, and dyd conferre a certaine time with Pfenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wifest priestes at that time that were in Egypt: whom when he heard rehearse the storic of the Iles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the fame in verse, & dyd send it abroade through GRECE. At his departure out of EGYPT he went into Cyprvs, where he had great curtefy & friendship of one of the princes of that countrie, called Philocyprus, who was lorde of a prety litle cittie which Demophon (Thefeus fonne) caused to be built vpon the river of Clarie, & was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane and barren coutrie. Whereupo Solon tolde him, it would doe better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very fayer & pleafaunt valley that laye vnderneath it, and there to make it larger & statelier then it was: which was done according to his persuasio. And Solon self being C present at it, was made ouerseer of the buildings, which he dyd helpe to deuise and order in good forte, aswell in respect of pleasure, as for force and defence: insomuch as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other lordes of the countrie dyd followe thexample of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon, called his cittie Soles, which AEpia called before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his wordes vnto Philocyprus, as followeth.

So graunt the goddes, that thou, and thine offspring maye clyme to great, and passing princely state: long time to live in Soles florishing. And that they grount, my shippe and me good gate wwhen I from hense, by feas shall take my wwave: that with her harpe dame Venus doe vouchefafe to waft me still, untill she maye conveye my felfe againe, into my countrey fafe. Since I have bene the only meane and man, which here to build, this cittie first beganne.

And as for the meeting & talke between him & king Crass. I know there are that by distace of time will proue it but a fable, & deuised of pleasure: but for my parte I will not reject, nor codemne so famous an historie, received & approved by so many grave testimonies. Moreover it is very agreable to Solons maners & nature, & also not vnlike to his wisedom & magnanimitie: E although in all pointes it agreeth not with certaine tables (which they call Chronicles) where they have bufily noted the order and course of times which even to this daye many have curiously sought to correct, & could yet neuer discusse it, nor accorde all contrarieties & manifest repugnaunces in the same. Solon at the desire & request of Crassus, went to see him in the cittie of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he seemed to be in the selfe same taking that a man was once reported to be:who being borne & bred vp on the mayne lande, & had neuer feene the sea neither farre nor neere, did imagine enery river that he sawe had bene the sea. So Solon paffing alongest Crassus palace, & meeting by the waye many of the lordes of his courte richely apparelled, & carying great traines of seruing men, & souldiers about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill he was brought vnto Crafus felfe. Who was F paffing richely arrayed, what for precious stones & iuells, & for riche cullered filkes, layed on with curious goldsmithes worke, & all to shewe him self to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, &

A magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repayre to his presence, that he shewed no manner of figure, nor countenance of woundring, to fee fo great a state before him, neither had genen out any word neere or likely to that which Crafis looked for in his owne imagination, but rather had deliuered speaches for men of judgement and viderstanding to know, how inwardly he much did millike Crafus foolish vanitie & base minde: then Crasus commaunded all his treasuries to be opened where his golde & filuer laye, next that they should shewe him his riche & fumptuous wardroppes, although that needed not for to fee Crafus felf, it was enough to difcerne his nature & condition. After he had feene all ouer & ouer, being brought againe vnto the prefence of the King: Crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene any ma more happy than crass asked him, if euer he had seene asked him felf was? Solon aufwered him, I haue: & that was one Tellus a cittizen of A THENS, who was fion to Solon B a maruelous honest man, & had left his children behind him in good estimatio; & well to liue, pinter. & laftly, was most happy at his death, by dying honorably in the field, in defence of his coutrie. Solin effec-

Crafus hearing this auniwer, beganne to judge him a man of litle witte, or of groffe vnderstan - med Tellus a ding bicause he did not thincke that to have store of gold & silver, was the only joye & felicitie of the world, & that he would preferre the life & death of a meane & private man as more happy, than all the riches & power of so mightie a King. Notwithstanding all this, Crafus yet asked him again: What other man befide Tellus he had feene happier than him felf? Solon aunfwered him, that he had feene Cleobis & Biton, which were both brethern, & loued one ano Cleobis & Bither fingularly well, & their mother in fuch forte: that vpon a folemne festivall daye, when the ton, happy me.

should goe to the teple of Juno in her coche drawen with oxen: bicause they taried to long ere

C they could be brought, they both willingly yoked them selves by the necks, & drue their mothers coche in stead of the oxen, which maruelously rejoyced her, and she was thought most happy of all other, to have borne two fuch fonnes. Afterwards when they had done facrifice to the goddeffe, & made good cheere at the feaft of this facrifice, they went to bed: but they rofe not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurte or sorowe, after they had receyued so much glorie & honour, Crafus then could no loger bridell in his pacience, but breaking out in choller, fayed vnto him; why, doest theu recken me than in no degree of happy men? Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increase his heate, but auswered him thus: O King of Lydians, the godds have geve vs Grecians all things in a meane; Solon commet-& amongest other things chiefly, a base & popular wisedome, not princely nor noble : which, desh the

D confidering howe mans life is fubicate to infinite chaunges, doth forbid vs to truft or glorie in mane. these worldly riches. For time bringeth daylie misfortunes vnto man, which he neuer thought of nor looked for. But when the goddes have continued a mans good fortune to his end, then Nomen here we thinke that man happy and bleffed, and neuer before. Otherwife, if we should judge a man pie before his happy that liueth, confidering he is euer in daunger of change during life: we thould be much ende. like to him, who judgeth him the victorie before hande, that is still a fighting, & maye be ouercomen, having no fuertie yet to carie it away. After Solon had spoken these words, he departed from the Kings presence, and returned backe againe, leaving king Crass offended, but nothing the wifer, nor amended . Nowe A fope that wrote the fables, being at that time in the cittie of SARDIS, & fent for thither by the King, who entertained him very honorably: was we-

E ry forie to fee that the King had geuen Solon no better entertainement so by waye of aduite he stellar for faid vnto him. O Solon, either we must not come to princes at all, or els we must seeke to please ing it solon. & content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, aunswered him: either we must not come to princes, or we must needes tell them truely, & counsell them for the best. So Creeke made for to Ale. light accompt of Solon at that time. But after he had loft the battell against Corne. and that his fore cittie was taken him felf became prisoner, & was bounde fast to a gibbet, ouer a great stacke of wood, to be burnt in the fight of all the PERSIANS, & of Cyrus his enemie: he then cried out as lowde as he could, thryse together. O Solon. Cyrus being abashed, sent to aske him, whether this King Crass Solon he only cried upon in his extreme miletie, was a god or man. Crafis kept itnot feetet lon haging from him, but fayed he was one of the wife men of Greek, whom I fent for to come vnto me and a gibbe

F on a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I stoode in neede of, but only that to be burns. he might witnesse my felicitie, which then I dyd eniove the losse whereof is nowe more hurtefull, than the enioying of the fame was good or profitable. But nowe (alas) to late I king Cræfin of Sardie.

Riches are

know it, that the riches I possessed then, were but words & opinion, all which are turned now A but ander or to my bitter forowe, and to present and remediles calamitie. Which the wise GRECIAN confidering then, and foreseeing a farre of by my doings at that time, the instant miserie I suffer nowe: gaue me warning I should marke the ende of my life, and that I should not to farre prefume of my selfe, as puffed up then with vaine glorie of opinion of happines, the ground therof being fo flippery, and of fo litle fuertie. These wordes being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wifer than Crafus, & feeing Solons faying confirmed by fo notable an example: he dyd not only deliuer Crasus from present perill of death, but euer after honoured him so long as he liued. Thus had Solon glorie, for fauing the honour of one of these Kings: & the life of the other, by his graue & wife counfaill. But during the time of his ablence, great feditions role at ATHENS amongest the inhabitants, who had gotten them severall heades amongest them: as those of B the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coast men, Megacles, the sonne of Alemeon, And those of the mountaines, Pissitratus: with whom all artificers & crafts men living of their hadie labour were joyned, which were the stowtest against the riche. So that notwithstanding the cittie kept Solons lawes and ordinaunces, yet was there not that man but gaped for a chaunge. and desired to see things in another state: either parties hoping their condition would mende by chaunge, and that euery of them should be better than their aduersaries. The whole common weale broyling thus with troubles, Solon arrived at ATHENS, where every madid honour neth to Aand reuerence him, howbeit he was no more able to speake allowed in open affembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, bicause his age would not suffer him: & therefore he spake with enery one of the heades of the seuerall factions a parte, trying if he C could agree and reconcile them together againe. Whereunto Pisistratus seemed to be more willing then any of the rest, for he was curteous, and maruelous sayer spoken, and shewed him felfe befides, very good and pittiefull to the poore, and temperate also to his enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he dyd so finely counterfeate it, that men imagined it was more in him, than in those that naturally had it in them in deede. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aspiring no higher, and hating those which would attempt to chaunge the present state of the common weale, and would practise any innouation. By this arte and fine manner of his , he deceyued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him straight, and sawe the marke he shot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and fought still to winne him, and bring him to reason, saying oftetimes, both to him selfe, and D to others. That who so could plucke out of his head the worme of ambition, by which he afpired to be the chiefest, and could heale him of his greedy desire to rule: there could not be a The pirama man of more vertue, or a better cittizen than he would proue. About this time begane The list to fet out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delited the people for the rarenes thereof, being not many poets yet in number, to striue one against another for victorie, as afterwards

there were. Solon being naturally defirous to heare and learne, and by reason of his age seeking to passe his time awaye in sportes, in musicke, & making good cheere more then euer he dyd: went one daye to see Thespis, who played a parte him selfe, as the olde facion of the Poetswas, and after the playe was ended he called him to him, and asked him: if he were not alhamed to lye so openly in the face of the worlde. The spis aunswered him, that it was not materiall to doe E or fave any fuch things, confidering all was but in sporte. Then Solon beating the grounde with his staffe he had in his hande: but if we commend lying in sporte (4) he) we shall finde it afterwards in good earnest, in all our bargaines & dealings. Shortely after Pilistratus having wounded him felf, and bloudied all his bodie ouer, caused his men to carre him in his coche into the market place, where he put the people in an vprore, & tolde them that they were his enemies that thus traiteroully had hadled & arraied him, for that he stoode with them about the governing of the comon weale:infomuch as many of the were maruelously offended,& mutined by & by , crying out it was shamefully done . Then Solon drawing neere saved vnto him , O thou fonne of Hippocrates, thou doest ill fauoredly couterfeate the persone of Homers Visiles: for thou hast whipped thy self to deceive thy cittizes, as he did teare & scratch him self, to deceive his F enemies. Notwithstanding this, the common people were still in vprore, being ready to take armes for Pissitratus: and there was a generall counsell affembled in the which one Ariston

A fpake, that they should graunte fiftie men, to cary holberds and mases before Pilistratus for garde of his persone. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, stowtely inuaved against it: and persuaded the people with many reasons, like vnto these he wrote afterwards in verse.

Eche one of you (ô men) in private actes, can playe the foxe, for five and subtill craft: But wwhen you come , yfore (in all your factes) then are you blinde, dull wvitted and bedaft. For pleasaunt speache, and painted flatterie, beguile you still the wwhich you never five.

But in the ende, feeing the poore people dvd tumult ftill, taking Pilistratus parte, and that B the riche fled here and there, he went his waye also, saying the had shewed him selfe wifer than some and hardier than other. Meaning, wifer than those which sawe not Pilistratus reache and fetche; and hardier than they which knewe very well he dyd affire to be King, and yet neuertheles durst not resist him. The people went on with the motion of Ariston, and authorifed the fame, touching the graunte of halberders: limiting no number, but fuffered him to have about him and to affemble, as many as he would, vntill fuch time as he had gotten possession of the castell. Then the cittie was maruelously affrayed and amazed; and prefently Megacles, and all those which were of the house of the Alemeonides dyd flye. Solon, who for yeares was now at his last cast, and had no man to sticke vnto him; went not with standing into the market place, and spake to the cittizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beastli-C nes, and faynte cowardly hartes, and encouraged them not to lofe their libertie. He spake at that time notably, and worthie memorie, which ever after was remembred. Before faved he. you might more easely have stayed this present tyrannie: but nowe that it is already factoned you shall winne more glorie, vtterly to suppresse it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken to him, they were all fo amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe and tooke his weapons out of his house, and layed them before his gate in the middless of the streete, faying. For my parte, I have done what I can possible to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my countrie. So from that time he betooke him selfe vnto his ease, and neuer after delt any more in matters of state, or common weale. His friends dyd counsell him to flye; but all they could not perfuade him to it. For he kept his house, and gaue him selfe solons liber-D to make verses : in which he fore reproued the ATHENIAMS faults laying :

If presently your burden heavy be: yet murmure not against the godds therefore. The fault is yours, as you your felues maye fee, which graunted have of mightie mars the love, to fuch as nouve, by your direction doe holde your necks, in this subjection.

His friends hereupon dyd warne him, to beware of fuch speaches, and to take hede what he fayed: least if it came vnto the tyrannes eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherein he trusted, that he spake so boldly. He aunswered them, in my age. E Howbeit Pisitratus after he had obteined his purpose, sending for him vpon his worde and faith, dyd honour and entertaine him fo well, that Solon in the ende became one of his counfaill, and approued many things which he dyd . For Pifistratus him felfe dyd straightly keepe, and caused his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Insomuch as when he was called by proces into the courte of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrante: he prefented him felfe very modeftly to aunswer his accusation, and to purge him selfe thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further . Pisistratus him selfe also dyd make newe lawes: as this. That he that had bene maymed, and made lame of any member in the Agoodlane warres, should be mainteined all his life long, at the common charges of the cittie. The felfe fernice. fame was before decreed by Thersippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons persuasion: who dyd F preferre it to the counsell. Pilistratus afterwards tooke holde of the motion, and from thence forth made it a generall lawe . Theophrastus sayeth also, it was Pissitratus, and not Solon, that made the lawe for idlenes: which was the only cause that the countrie of Arrica became A more fruitefull, being better manured: and the cittie of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon having begonne to write the storie of the Iles ATLANTIDES in verse (which he had learned of the wife men of the cittie of SAIS in EGYPT, and was very necessary for the ATHE-NIANS) grewe wearye, and gaue it ouer in mid waye: not for any matters or busines that troubled him, as Plato layed, but only for his age, and bicause he feared the tediousnes of the worke. For otherwise he had leysure enough, as appeareth by his verses where he sayeth:

I grouve olde, and yet I learne still.

And in another place where he fayeth, Novve Venus yeldes me svvete delights, and Bacchus lends me comfort fill: the mufes eke refreshe my (prights, and much relieuemy vveary vvill. These be the pointes of perfect ease. vuhich all mens mindes oftetimes doe please.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the storie and fables of the Iles ATLANTIDES, was defirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by waye of speache haue broken vp a field or layelande of his owne, or that this gifte had descended to him of right from Solon. He beganne to raise vp a stately fronte vnto the same, and enclosed it with high walles, and large squared courtes at the entrie thereof: such was it, as neuer any other worke, fable, or poeticall inuention had euer so notable, or the like. But bicause he beganne a litle to late, he ended his C life before his worke, leauing the readers more forowfull for that was left vnwritten, than they tooke pleasure in that they founde written. For even as in the cittle of Athens, the temple of Impiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: fo the wildome of Plato (amongest many goodly matters of his that have come abroade) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Iles ATLANTIDES. Solon lived long time after Pilistratus had viurped the tyrannie, as Heraelides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Ephesian writeth, that he lived not aboue two yeres after . For Pifitratus viurped tyrannicall power in the yere that Comius was chief gouernour in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the yere that Hegestratus was go-uernour, which was the next yere after that. And where some saye, the ashes of his bodie were after his death strawed abroade through the Ile of SALAMINA: that feemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheles it hath bene written by many notable authours, and amongest others, by Ariftotle the philosopher.

The ende of Solons life.

Valerius Publicola.

O WE we have declared what Solon was, we have thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the Romaine people for an honour gaue that furname : for he was called before Publius Valerius, The house of descended from that auncient Valerius, who was one of the chiefest P. Valerius. worckers and meanes, to bring the ROMAINES and the SABYNES that were mortall enemies, to joyne together as one people. For it was he that most moued the two Kings to agree, and joyne together. Publicola being descended of him, whilest the Kings dyd rule yet at ROME, was in very great estimation, aswell for his eloquence, as for

B berally and curteoully, for the relief of the poore. So that it was manifest, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publicke state, he should be one of the chiefest men of the same. It chaunced that king Tarquine furnamed the prowde, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull Tarquinius meane, but contrarylie by indirect and wicked wayes, and behaving him felfe not like a King, Supirbus. but like a cruell tyrante: the people much hated and detested him, by reason of the death of Lucretia (which killed her felfe for that the was forcibly rauithed by him) & fo the whole cittie rose and rebelled against him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head and captaine of this infurrection and rebellion, dyd iowne first with this Valerius: who dyd greately fauour and Paterius, who dyd greately fauour and Productions affift his enterprise, and did helpe him to drive out king Tarquine with all his house & familie. panion, in ex-Nowe whilest they were thincking that the people would chuse some one alone to be chief pulling the

C ruler ouer them, in stead of a King : Valerius kept him selfe quiet, as yelding willingly vnto Brutus the first place, who was meetest for it, having bene the chief authour and worcker of their recouered libertie. But when they fawe the name of Monarchie (as much to faye, as foueraintie alone) was displeasaunt to the people, and that they would like better to have the rule deui-hisriches: vsing the one rightly and freely, for the maintenaunce of iustice, and the other lided vnto two, and how for this cause they would rather choose two Consuls: Valerius then Lucius Branch begane to hope, he should be the seconde persone with Brutus. Howbeit this hope sayled him. For against Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia was chosen Coful with Tarquinius him: not bicause he was a man of greater vertue, or of better estimation than Valerius. But the confust.

noble men of the cittle fearing the practites of the Kings abroade, which fought by all the fayer & flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the cittie: dyd determine to make fuch an one Conful, whom occasion forced to be their hard and heavy enemie, persuading them selves that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeld vnto them. Valerius tooke this matter greuously, but they had a mistrust in him, as if he would not doe any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: notwithstanding he had neuer any private injurie offered him by the tyrannes. Wherfore, he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for private men, and wholy gaue vp to medle in matters of state: infomuch as he gaue many occasion to thincke of his absence, and it troubled some men much, who feared least vpon this his misliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings fide, and to bring all the cittie in an vprore, confidering it stoode then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who stoode in icalousie of some, B would by othe be affured of the Senate, & had appointed them a daye folemnely to take their othes vpon the facrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerefull countenaunce came into the market place, and was the first that tooke his othe he would leaue nothing vndone, that might preiudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight against them, and defend the libertie of the cittie. This othe of his maruelously rejoyced the Senate, & gaue great affuraunce also to the Consuls, but specially, bicause his dedes dyd shortly after performe his The first wordes. For there came ambassadours to Rome which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of fweete & lowly speaches to winne the fauour of the people, with commission to vse all guine for re- the mildest meanes they could, to dulce and soften the hardened harts of the multitude: who declared how the King had left all pryde and crueltie,& ment to aske nought but reasonable C things. The Confuls thought best to geue them open audience, and to suffer them to speake to the people. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might perill the state much, and deliuer occasion of new sturre vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more affrayed of warres, then of tyrannie. After that, there came other ambaffadours also, which sayed that Tarquine would from thenceforth for euer geue ouer and renounce his title to the Kingdome, and to Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeld to this request, and specially Collatinus, one of the Confuls who dyd fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a fast and refolute man, and very fierce in his harte, ranne immediately into the market place, crying out D that his fellowe Conful was a traytour, and contented to graunt the tyrannes matter, and meanes to make warre vpon the cittie, where in deede they deserved not so much, as to be re-beit this was the least parte of Tarquines intent, to seeke his goodes againe but vnder pretence F of that demaund, he fecretly corrupted the people, and practifed treason, which his ambassadours followed, pretending only to get the Kings goodes and his fauourers together, faying, that they had already folde some parte, and some parte they kept, and sent them daylie. So as by delaying the time in this forte with fuch pretences, they had corrupted two of the best and auncientest houses of the cittie: to wit, the familie of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senatours: and the familie of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senatours: all which by their mothers, were Conful Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians also were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their owne fifter, & had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawen to their stringe, two of the eldest of them, bicause they familiarly frequented together, being cosin germaines: whom they had intifed to be of their conspiracie, allying them with F the house of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perfuade them felues to rife to great honour & preferment by meanes of the Kings, rather than lieued in their exile. Hereupon the people affembled together, and the first that spake in this affembly, was a private man called Gaius Minutius, who ipeaking vnto Brutus, & to the whole A to trust to their fathers willfull hardnes. For they called his seueritie to the wicked, hardnes: for that he would neuer pardone any. Furthermore Brutus had fayned him felfe mad, and a foole of long time for fafety of his life, bicause the tyrannes should not put him to death: so that the name of Brutus only remained. After these two young men had geuen their consent to be of the confederacie, and had spoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bounde one to another, with a great and horrible othe, drincking the bloude of a man, and shaking hands in his bowells, whom they would facrifice. This matter agreed youn betweene them, they met together to put their facrifice in execution, in the house of the Aquilians. The confedethem, they met orgenied to put them factines in the foliation, in the nome of the Capitalians. They had fittedy pickt out a darcke place in the house to doe this facrifice in, & where almost with drinking no bodye came; yet it happened by chaunce, that one of the seruants of the house called Vin- of mat bond,

B dicius, had hidden him felfe there, vnknowing to the traytours, and of no fet purpose, to spye and fee what they dyd, or that he had any manner of inckling thereof before: but falling by chaunce vpon the matter, euen as the traytours came into that place with a countenaunce to hearth all doe some secret thing of importaunce, fearing to be seene, he kept him selfe close, and laye be- their meason. hinde a coffer that was there, so that he sawe all that was done, and what they sayed and determined. The conclusion of their counsell in the ende was this, that they would kill both the mined. The conclution of their counties in the ende was tills, that they would kill both the Confuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertifing the fame, which they gaue vnto his fin of their fine of their ambaffadours, being lodged in the houle of the Aquilians, & were present at this conclusion. measure With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out also as fecretly as he could, being marueloufly troubled in minde, & at a maze howe to deale in this matter. For he thought it daungerous (as it was in deede) to goe and accuse the two sonnes vnto the father (which was Brutus) of fo wicked and detestable a treason, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other fide also, he thought this was a secret, not to be imparted to any private persone, and not possible for him to concease it, that was bounde in duery to reueale it. So he resolued at the last to goe to Valerius to bewraye this treason, of a fpeciall affection to this man, by reason of his gentle and curteous vsing of men, geuing easy accesse and audience vnto any that came to speake with him, and specially for that he disdained not to heare poore mens causes. Vindicius being gone to speake with him, and having Vindicius tolde him the whole conspiracy before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was a- bewrayeth bashed and fearefull withall: whereupon he stayed him least he should slippe awaye, and loc-

And willed his brother also, that he should goe and befet the Kings palace round about to intercept these letters if it were possible, and to see that none of their servants fled. Valerius felfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friendes and people that wayted on him, went straight vnto the house of the Aquilians, who by chaunce were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he founde the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquines ambassadours laye. Whilest he was thus occupied, the Aquilians having intelligence thereof, ranne home immediately, and founde Valerius coming out at their gate. So they would have taken those letters from him by force, and strong hande. But Valerius and his company dyd resist them, and moreouer hudded E them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought them (doe what they could) into the market place. The like was done also in the Kings palace, where Marcus Valerius founde other letters also wrapt vp in certaine fardells for their more fafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place, all the Kings feruaunts he founde there. There the Confuls having caused filence to be made, Valerius sent home to his house for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Confuls: then the traytours were openly accused. and their letters redde, and they had not the face to aunswer one worde. All that were present, being amazed, honge downe their heades, and behelde the grounde, and not a man durft once open his mouth to speake, excepting a fewe, who to gratifie Brutus, beganne to say that they should banishe them : and Collatinus also gave them some hope, bicause he fell to weeping,

F and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his fonnes by their names: come on (fayed he) Titus, and thou Valerius, why doe you not aunswer to that you Titus of Vaare accused of and having spoken thryse vnto them to aunswer, when he sawe they stoode some immediately vpon the two young men, and tearing their clothes of their backs, bounde their hands behinde them, and then whipped them with roddes: which was fuch a pittiefull fight to all the people, that they could not finde in their hartes to behold it, but turned them felues another waye, bicause they would not see it. But contrariwise, they saye that their owne father cution of the rest vnto his fellowe Consul. This was such an acte, as men cannot sufficiently B prayse, nor reproue enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his minde so quiet, or els the greatnes of his miserie that tooke awaye the feeling of his sorowe: whereof so made petition they might have time geven them to aunswer to the articles they were accufed of, and that they might have their flaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their handes, bicause there was no reason he should remaine with their accusers. The Consul seemed willing to yeld thereto, and was ready to breake vp the affembly thereupon . But Valerius fayed, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the affembly that attended upon his persone) and stayed the people besides for departing awaye, least they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly sought to betraye their countrie. Vntill he him selfe had man Vindicius. So the sergeants making waye through the prease, layed handes vpon him to bring him awaye with them, and beganne to strike at them which offered to resist them . But

Valerius friends stept out before them, and put them by. The people showted straight, & cried out for Brutus: who with this noyle returned agains into the market place, and after filence made him, he spake in this wife. For mine own children, I alone have bene their sufficiet judg,

But it is better the judgement fonnes. of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their judgemets should diminishe his vertue. For the Romaines holde opinion, it was not so great an acte done of Romulus first to build Rome: as it was for Brutus to recouer Rome, and the best libertie there-fome recompence, caused him not only to be manumised by the whole graunte of the people, F but made him a free man of the cittle besides : and he was the first bondman manumised, that was made cittizen of Rome, with permission also to gene his voyce in all elections of officers, before had in some suspition, as allied to the Kings, and disliked for his surname, bicause he collainure was called Tarquinius: who perceyving him felfe in this case much hated and mistrusted of the people, voluntarely yelded vp his Confulshippe, and departed the cittie. The people afdeparted fembling then them selues, to place a successour in his roome: they chose Valerius in his roome, without the contradiction of any, for his faithfull trauaill and diligence bestowed in now in this great matter. Then Valerius judging that Vindicius the bondman had well deserved also

A in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in Long time after that, and very lately Appias to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumifed, to geue their voyces also in elections, as other cittizens dyd: and vnto this daye the perfect manumifing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then Vindicta fo made a free man. These things thus passed ouer, the goodes of the Kings were geuen to the called, by reaspoyle of the people, and their palaces were rased and ouerthrowen. Nowe amongest other fine friends lands, the goodliest parte of the field of Mars was beloging vnto king Tarquine: the fame they confecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, & not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The sheaues being yet in shocks in the field, they thought they might not grinde the field cofectawheate, nor make any commoditie of the profit thereof: wherefore they threwe both corne & sed to Mars. B sheares into the river, & trees also which they had hewen downe & rooted vo to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, should be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. These sheaues thus throwe into the river, were caried down by the streame not farre from thence, vnto a forde and shallowe place of the water, where they first dyd staye, and dyd let the other which came after, that it could goe no further: there these heapes gathered together, and laye so close one to another, that they beganne to sincke and settle fast in the water. Afterwards the streame of the river brought downe continually such mudde & gravell, that it euer increased the heape of corne more and more in suche sorte, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather foftly preffing and driving it together, dyd firme and harden it and made it growe so to lande. Thus it leape rising still in greatnes and C firmenes, by reason that all that came downe the riu there, it grewe in the ende, and oly Ilande in ROME: in which are by time to spread so farre, that at this daye it is called many goodly temples of divers goddes, and fundry walkes about it, and they call it in Latine, holy Iland Inter duos pontes: in our tongue, betweene the two bridges. Yet some write, that this thing fell came in Ro-not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was confecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwardes, when one of the Vestall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers bridges. vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquines field. For which liberalitie and bowntie of hers, they dyd graunte her in recompele many priviledges, and dyd her great honour besides. As amongest others, it was ordeined, that her word & witnes should stand good, & be allowed, in matters indiciall: which priniledge, neuer woma besides her self dyd enioye. D By speciall grace of the people also, it was graunted her, that she might marie if she thought it good: but yet the would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the reporte how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being past hope of euer entring into his Kingdome Tarquinius coagaine, went yet vnto the THVSCANS for Succour, which were very glad of him: and so they mail with a leauied a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his Kingdome againe. The Confuls the Thuleans also hearing thereof, went out with their armie against him . Both the armies presented them to rage batfelues in battell raye, one against another, in the holy places consecrated to the goddes: wherRemainer. of the one was called the worde Arsia, and the other the meadowe Assura. And as both ar- Arsia sima. mies beganne to geue charge vpon eche other, Aruns the eldest sonne of king Tarquine, and the Conful Brutus encoutered together, not by chaunce, but fought for of fet purpose to exe-

The one, as against a tyrante and red, and students enemie of the libertie of his countrie: the other, as against him that had bene chief authour & ethe other, worker of their exile and expulsion. So they set spurres to their horses, so soone as they had foved eche other, with more fury then reason, and fought so desperately together, that they both fell starke dead to the ground. The first onser of the battell being so cruell, the end thereof was no leffe bloudy: vntill both the armies having receyued and done like damage to eche other, were parted by a maruelous great tempest that fell vpon them. Nowe was Valerius maruelously perplexed, for that he knewe not which of them wanne the field that daye: seeing his fouldiers as forowfull for the great loffe of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the flaughter and victorie of their enemies. For, to viewe the multitude of the flaine

F bodies of either fide, the number was so equall in fight, that it was very hard to judge, of which fidefell out the greatest slaughter: so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were persuaded in their opinion, that they had rather lost then wone, coniecturing a farre of the fall of their enemies. The night being come, fuch things fell out, as A maye be looked for after so terrible a battell. For when both campes were all layed to rest, they faye the wodde wherein they laye incamped, quaked and trembled : and they heard a voyce faye, that onely one man more was flaine on the THUSCANS fide, than on the ROMAINES parte. Out of doubt this was some voyce fro heaven: for the ROMAINES thereupo gaue a shrill showte, as those whose hartes received a newe quickening spirite or corage. The THVSCANS the Thissan. on the contrarie parte were so affrayed, that the most parte of them stole out of the campe, & scattered here and there: & there remained behind about the number of five thousand men.

whom the Romaines tooke prisoners every one, and had the spoile of their campe. The carkaffes were viewed afterwards, & they found that there were flaine in that battell, eleuen thoufand and three hundred of the THYSCANS: and of the ROMAINES, fo many fauing one. This B battell was fought (as they fave) the last daye of Februarie, and the Conful Valerius triumphed, first Consid being the first of the Consuls that ever entered into Rome triumphing ypon a charet drawen with foure horses, which sight the people found honorable & goodly to beholde, & were not offended withall (as some seeme to reporte) nor yet dyd enuy him for that he beganne it. For if it had bene fo, that custome had not bene followed with so good acceptatio, nor had cotinued fo many yeres as it dyd afterwards. They much commended alfo the honour he dyd to his fellowe Conful Brutus, in fetting out his funeralles & obsequies, at the which he made a funerall oration in his praise. They did so like & please the Romaines, that they have ever since continued that custome at the buriall of any noble man, or great personage, that he is openly praition among the fed at his buriall, by the worthiest man that liueth among them. They reporte this funerall o- C ration is farre more auncient then the first, that was made in GRECE in the like case: onles they will confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praifing the dead at their funeralls, was first of all instituted by Solon, But they dyd most enuve Valerius, and fareth, Solon beare him grudge, bicause Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their libertie) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twife, that they should appoint Valerius fellowe Conful with him. This man in contrariwife (fayed the people) taking vpon him alone for the dead the rule & foueraintie, sheweth plainely he will not be Brutus successiour in his Consulshippe, but Tarquinius felf in the Kingdome. For to great purpose was it to praise Brutus in wordes,& to followe Tarquinius in deedes: having borne before him felfe only all the mases, the axes and the roddes, when he cometh abroade out of his owne house, which is farre greater, and more D stately, then the Kings palace which he him self ouerthrewe. And to save truely, Valerius dwelt in a house a litle to sumptuously built & seated, vpon the haging of the hill called mount Veding on moint lia: & bicause it stoode highe, it ouerlooked all the market place, so that any man might easely fee from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very ill to come to it: but when he came out of his house, it was a maruelous pompe and state to see him come downe from so highe a place, & with a traine after him, that carried the maieftie of a Kings courte. But herein Valerius left 2 noble example, thewing howe much it importeth 2 noble man & magistrate, rugood example ling weighty causes, to have his eares open to heare, and willingly to receive free speache in steade of flatteries, & playne trothe in place of lyes. For, being enformed by some of his frieds for maziftrases, how the people misliked & complained of it, he stoode not in his owne conceit, neither was E angrie with them: but forthwith fet a worlde of workmen vpon it, earely in the morning before breake of daye,& comaunded them to plucke down his house, & to rase it to the ground. Infomuch as the next day following, whe the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, & fawe this great fodaine ruine, they much commended the noble acte & minde of Valerius, in doing that he dyd: but so were they angrie, and sorie both, to see so faver and stately a buylt house (which was an ornament to the cittie) ouerthrowen vpon a sodaine. Much like in comparison to a man, whom through spite and enuie they had vniustly put to death: and to fee their chief magistrate also like a straunger and a vacabonde, compelled to feeke his lodging in another mans house. For his friends receyued him into their houses, vntill such time as the people had geuen him a place, where they dyd build him a newe house, farre F more orderly, and nothing fo stately and curious as the first was, and it was in the same place, where the temple called Views Publicus standeth at this daye. Now bicause he would not only

A reforme his persone, but the office of his Consulthippe, & also would frame him selfe to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before he feemed vnto them to be fearefull, he put awaye the carying of the axes from the roddes, which the fergeants vied to beare before the Conful. Moreouer when he came into the market place, where the people were affembled, he caused the roddes to be borne downewardes, as in token of reuerence of the fourraine maiestie of the people: which all the magistrates observe yet at this daye. Nowe in all this humble showe and lowlines of his, he dyd not so much imbase his dignitic and greatnes, which the common people thought him to have at the first: as he dyd thereby cut of enuie from him, winning againe as much true authoritie, as in semblaunce he would seeme to haue lost. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to submit them B felues vnto him: infomuch as vpon this occasion he was furnamed Publicola, as much to fave, vvin Valeas the people pleaser. Which surname he kept euer after, and we from henceforth also wri- vine was surting the rest of his life, will vse no other name; for he was contented to suffer any man that blicole. would, to offer him felfe to aske the Confulshippe in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kynde of man they would ioyne fellowe Conful with him, and fearing leaft through enuie or ignoraunce, the party might thwart his purpose and meaning: employed his sole power and authoritie whilest he ruled alone, vpon highe and noble attempts. For first of all Publicolars he supplied up the number of Senatours that were greatly decayed, bicause king Tarquine after and had put some of them to death not long before, and other also had bene lately slaine in the warres: in whose places he had chosen newe Senatours, to the number of a hundred three C fcore and foure. After that he made newe decrees and lawes, which greatly dyd aduaunce the authoritie of the people. The first lawe gaue libertie to all offendours, condemned by judgement of the Confuls, to appeale vnto the people. The fecod, that no man vpon payne of death should take upon him the exercise of any office, unles he had come unto it by the gifte of the people. The third was, and all in fauour of the poore, that the poore cittizens of Rome should paye no more custome, nor any impost whatsoeuer. This made euery man the more willing to geue him selfe to some craste or occupation, when he sawe his trauaill should not be taxed. nor taken from him. As for the law that he made against those that disobeyed the Consuls, it was founde to be so fauorable to the communaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, than for the riche & great men. For the offendours & breakers of that lawe, were con-D demned to paye for a penaltie, the value of fine oxen, and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, tenne oboles, and of an oxe, a hundred oboles. For in those dayes, the ROMAINES had no store of coined mony, otherwise, they lacked no sheepe, nor other rother beasts. Hereof it came, that to this daye they call their riches or fubftaunce, Peculium, bicause Pecus fignity fieth sheepe and muttons. And in the olde time the stampe vpon their money was an oxe . 2 Peculis mutton, or a hogge: & fome of them called their children Bubulei, which fignifieth cowheards: was called. others Caprarij, to saye goateheards: and others Porcij, as you would saye, swineheardes. Nowe that moderation fomtimes he dyd fet grieuous paynes & punishements. For he made it law-though in all his other lawes, he was very fauorable & temperate toward the people : yet in full to kill any man without any accusation, that dyd aspire to the Kingdome, & he dyd set the E murderer free of all punishement: so he brought forth manifest proofe, that the party slaine. had practifed to make him felfe King. As being impossible a man should pretend so greats matter, and no man should finde it : and contrariwise being possible, albeit hewere spyed, that otherwise he might attempt it, by making him selfe so strong, that he needed not passe for the law. In this case he gaue every man libertie by such acte or meane, to prevent him if he could of discretion: who by strength otherwise sought to aspire to reigne. They greatly commended him also for the lawe that he made touching the treasure. For being very necessarie that euerie prinate cittizen should according to his abilitie, be contributer to the charges and maintenaunce of the warres: he him felf would neither take fuch collection into his charge, nor fuffer any man of his to medle with the fame, nor yet that it should be layed in any primate

F mans house, but he dyd ordeine that Saturnes tepleshould be the treasurie thereof. This order they keepe to this present daye. Furthermore, he grauted the people to chuse two young men Questores of the same, as you would saye the treasurers, to take the charge of this money: Questiones.

this accompt, or phanes, nor widowes, which were excepted from all payments. After he had established all these things, he caused Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be chosen fellowe Lucretine & Consul with him, vnto whom, for that he was his auncient, he gaue the vpper hande, and commaunded they should carie before him the roddes, which were the signes of the chief magistrate: and euer since they have geven this honour vnto age. But Lucretius dying not Publicola & long after his election, they chose againe in his place Marcus Horatius, who held out the Macus Ha- Confullhippe with Publicola the rest of the yere. Nowe about that time king Tarquine remained in the coutrie of Thys cane, where he prepared a secode armie against the Romaines, B & there fell out a maruelous straunge thing thereupon. For when he raigned king of Rome, he had almost made an ende of the building of the temple of Impiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receyued, or vpon any fantafy it is not knowen) to fet vp a coche of earth baked by a potter, in the highest place of the temple, and he put it out to be done by certaine THYSCAN workemen of the cittie of VEIES: but whilest they were in hand with the worcke, he was driven out of his Realme. When the worckemen had formed this coche, and that they had put it into the fournes to bake it, it fell out contrarie to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worcke put into the fournes. For the earth dyd not shut and close together in the fire, nor dryed up all the moisture thereof: but rather to the contrarie it dyd swell to such a bignes, and grewe so harde and strong withall, that they C were driuen to breake vp the head and walles of the fournes to get it out. The foothefayers dyd expounde this, that it was a celestiall token from aboue, and promised great prosperitie and increase of power vnto those, that should enjoye this coche. Whereupon the VEIANS resolued not to deliuer it vnto the ROMAINES that demaunded it, but aunswered that it dyd belong vnto king Tarquine, and not vnto those that had banished him . Not many dayes after, there was a solemne feast of games for running of horses in the cittie of VEIES, where they dyd alfo many other notable actes, worthy fight according to their custome. But after the game was played, he that had wonne the bell, being crowned in token of victorie as they dyd vie at that time, brought his coche and horses fayer and softely out of the showe place: and fodainely the horse being affrayed vpon no present cause or occasion seene, whether it was D by chaunce, or by fome fecret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their coche to the cittie of Rome. The coche driver dyd what he could possible at the first to staye them, by holding in the raynes, by clapping them on the backs, and speaking gently to them: but in the ende, perceyuing he could doe no good, and that they would have their fwynge, he gaue place to their furie, & they neuer linne ronning, till they brought him neere to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrewe him and his coche, not farre from the gate called at this prefent, Ratumena. The VEIANS woundering much at this matter, and being affrayed withall: were contented the workmen should deliuer their coche made of earth vnto the Romaines. Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquine the first (which was the sonne of Demarawowed in the warres that he made against the SABYNES, that he would buyld it. And E Tarquine the prowde, being the sonne of him that made this vowe dyd buyld it: howbeit he dyd not confecrate it, bicause he was driven out of his Kingdome before he had finished it. When this temple was built and throughly finished, & set forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was maruelously desirous to haue the honour of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glorie, being very angrie that he could not content him felfe with all those honours that he had receyued in peace, for the good lawes he had made, and in warres for the victories he had obteined & well deferued, but further that he would feeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing dyd pertaine vnto him: they then dyd egge Horarius, & persuaded him to make sute for the same . Occasion fell out at that time, that Publicola must have the leading of the ROMAINES armie into the field: in the meane time, while Publi- F cola was absent, it was procured that the people gaue their voyces to Horatius, to consecrate the temple, knowing they could not so well have brought it to passe he being present. Other

A faye, the Confuls drewe lotts betweene them, and that it lighted upon Publicola to leade the armie against his will, and vpon Horatius to consecrate this temple, which maye be consectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication thereof. For all the people being affembled together in the Capitoll with great filence, on the fiftenth daye of the moneth of September, which is about the newe moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius having done all the ceremonies needefull in fuche a case, and holding then the doores of the temple, as the vie was even to vtter the solemne wordes of dedication: Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, having stoode a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunitie to speake, beganne to say alow de in this wife. My lorde Consul, your sonne is dead of a ficknes in the campe. This made all the affembly forie to heare it, but it nothing amafed B. Horatius, who foake only this muche. Cast his bodie then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to ende his confectation. This was but a deuile and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, only to make Horatius leave of his confectation. Horatius in this shewed him selfe a maruelous resolute man, were it that he streight founde his deuise, or that he beleeved it to be true: for the sodainenes of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in confecrating of the second temple. For this first which Tarquine had built and Horatius confecrated, was confumed by fyer in the ciuill warres: and the fe-How of Iupicond was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus fet vp the fu-temple was perscription of the dedication, bicause Sylla dyed before he could dedicate it. The second burn and temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumultes which were at Rome, vnc der Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Velbafian, from the ground to the toppe. But this good happe he had aboue other: to fee his worke perfited and finished before his death, and not ouerthrowen as it was immediately after his death. Wherein he dyd farre passe the happines of Sylla, who dyed before he could dedicate that he had built: and thother deceased before he sawe his worcke ouerthrowen. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the only foundations of the first temple, cost Tarquinius fortic thousand Pondos of filuer. And to gyld only the temple which we fee nowe in our time, they fave all the goodes and fubstaunce How much that the richest cittizen of ROME then had, will come nothing neere vnto it: for it cost a- was seen in boue twelue thousand talents. The pillers of this temple are cut out of a quarrie of mar-D bell, called pentlike marbell, and they were squared parpine, as thicke as long: these I sawe at ATHEN S. But afterwardes they were cut againe, and polished in Rome, by which doing they got not so much grace, as they lost proportion: for they were made to slender, and lest naked of their first beawtie. Nowe he that would wounder at the stately buylding of the Capitoll, if he came afterwardes vnto the palace Domitian, and dyd but fee fome galerie, porche, hall, or hotte house, or his concubines chambers: he would save (in my opi nion) as the poet Epicharmus sayed of a prodigall man.

> It is a fault, and folly both in thee to lashe our giftes, and prodigall revvardes: For fande delights, without all rule that be, regarding not wohat happens afterwardes.

So might they justly faye of Domitian. Thou art not liberall, nor deuoute vnto the goddes: butit is a vice thou halt to loue to buyld, and desirest (as they saye of olde Midas) that all a- Domition bout thee were turned to gold, and precious stones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine mad building after that great foughten battell wherein he fost his fonne (that was flaine by Bruttu in figh-humor. ting together hande to hande) went to the cittie of C L V S I V M, vnto king Claras Porfena: the mightiest prince that raigned at that time in all ITATIE, and was both noble and a curteous prince. Porfena promiled him ayde: & first of all he fent to Rom sto fummone the cit- Porfena protizens to receive their King againe. But the ROMATNES refuling the furnmones, he sene the warres with forthwith an Heraulde to proclaime open warres against them, and to tell them where, and Rome.

F when he would meete them and then marched thitherwardes immediatly with a great are Publicola & mie. Publicola nowe being absent, was chosen Consult the second time, and Titus Lucretius in Consult.

116 PVBLICOLA. with him. When he was returned home againe to R o ME, bicause he would exceede king Por. I fena in greatnes of minde, he begane to buyld a cittle called SIGLIVRIA, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre fro Rome: & having walled it about to his maruelous charge. he fent thither feuen hundred cittizens to dwell there, to shewe that he made litle accompt of this warre. Howbeit Porfena at his coming dyd geue suche a lustie assault to the mount Janisulum, that they draue out the fouldiers which kept the fame: who flying towards Rome, were pursued so harde with the enemies, that with them they had entered the towne, had not Publisola made a faly out to refift them. Who beganne a hotte skirmithe harde by the river of Tyber, & there fought to have stayed the enemies to follow any further which being the greater number, dyd ouerlaye the ROMAINES, & dyd hurte Publicola very fore in this skirmishe, so as he was caried away into the cittie in his souldiers armes. And eue so was the other Cosul Ly B eretime hurte in like case: which so discoraged & frayed the Romaines, that they all tooke the to their legges, & fled towards the cittie. The enemies purfued them at their heeles as farre as the wodden bridge: fo that the cittie was in maruelous hazarde of taking vpon the fodaine. But Horaius Co- Horatius Cocles, & Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefest noble young men of the cittie, stood with them to the defence of the bridge, & made head against the enemie. This Hon ratius was furnamed Cocles (as much to faye, as one eye) bicaufe he had loft one of them in the warres. Howbeit other writers fave, it was bicause of his flat nose which was so soncke into his head, that they fawe nothing to parte his eyes, but that the eye browes dyd meete together by reason whereof the people thinking to surname him Cyclops, by corruption of the togue they called him(as they faye) Cocles . But how focuer it was , this Horatius Cocles had the courage to C thew his face against the enemie, & to kepe the bridge, vntill such time as they had cut & broken it vp behind him. When he faw they had done that, armed as he was, & hurte in the hippe with a pike of the Thuscans, he leaped into the river of Tyber, and faued him felfe by fwimming vnto the other fide. Publicola woundring at this manly acte of his, perfuaded the Romaie NES Itraight, euery one according to his abilitie, to giue him so much as he spent in a daye; & afterwards also he caused the common treasury to geue him as much lande as he could compasse about with his plowe in a daye. Furthermore he made his image of brasse to be set up in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after, Nowe whilest king Porfena was hottely bent, very straightly to besiege Rome, there beganne a famine among the ROMAINES: & to encrease the daunger, there came a newe ar- D mie out of Thyscane, which ouerranne, burnt, and made waste, all the territorie of Rome. Whereupon Publicola being chosen Consul, then the third time, thought he should neede to doe no more to resist Porfena brauely, but to be quiet only, & to looke well to the safe keeping of the citrie. Howbeit spying his oportunity, he secretly stole out of Rome with a power, & did fet vpon the THYSCANS that destroyed the countrie about: & ouerthrew &slue of them, five thousand men. As for the historie of Mutius, many doe diversely reporte it: but I will write it in such sorte, as I thincke shall best agree with the trothe. This Mutius was a worthic man in all respects, but specially for the warres. He denising howe he might come to kill king Porfena, disguised him selse in THVSCANS apparell, and speaking Thuscan very persectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kings chayer, in the which he gaue audience: and not know- E ing him perfectly, he durft not aske which was he, least he thould be discouered, but drue his fworde at aduenture, & flewe him whom he tooke to be King. Vpon that they layed holde on him, & examined him. And a panne full of fire being brought for the King that enteded to doe facrificevnto the goddes, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whileft the flesh of his hand dyd frye of, he neuer chaunged hewe nor contenaunce: the King woundering to fee fo straunge a fight, called to them to withdraw the How Musius fire, and he him felfe dyd deliuer him his fworde againe. Musius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they saye afterwardes, he had geuen him the surname of Scaula, as much to saye, as left handed, and told him in taking of it. Thou couldest not Porsena for feare have onercomed me, but nowe through curtefy thou hast wonne me. Therefore for goodwill I will F reueale that vnto thee, which no force, nor extremitie could have made me vtter. There are three hundred Romains s dispersed through thy campe, all which are prepared with

afte of Mu-

A like mindes to followe that I have begonne, only gaping for oportunitie to put it in practile: The lot fell on me to be the first to breake the Ise of this enterprise: & yet I am not foriemy hande fayled, to kill so worthie a man, that deserueth rather to be a friend, then an enemie vnto the ROMAINES. Porfena hearing this, did beleeue it, & euer after he gaue the more willing eare to those that treated with him of peace: not so much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in waite to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMAINES noble minde and great corage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scauola: howbeit Athenodorus, furnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octania; Augustus fifter, fayeth that he was also called Opliq onus. But Publicola taking king Porfena not to be so daugerous an enemie to Rome, as he should be a profitable fried & allie to the same: let him understand, that he was coteted to B make him judge of the controuerfie betweene them & Tarquine. Whom he dyd many times Publicola prouoke to come & haue his cause heard before king Porsena, where he would instifute to his maketh Porsena indee, face, that he was the naughtiest & most wicked man of the world, & that he was justly driven between them out of his countrie. Tarquine sharpely aunswered, that he would make no man his judge, and and the Tar-Porfena least of all other, for that having promifed him to put him againe in his Kingdom, he was nowe gone from his worde, and had chaunged his minde. Porfena was very angrie with this aunswer, judging this a manifest token that his cause was ill. Wherefore Porsena being solicited againe by his owne some Aruns, who loued the Romaines, dyd easely graunte them maines by peace youn condition: that they should redeliuer backe agains to him the lands they had got- Porfena. ten before within the countrie of THVSCAN, with the prisoners also which they had taken in

C this warre. & in liew thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the ROMAINES that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the ROMAINES delivered him oftages, tenne of the noblest mens sonnes of the cittie, & so many of their daughters: emog which, was Valeria; Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porfena brake his armie, & withdrewe his strength, trusting to the peace cocluded. The ROMAINES daughters deliuered for oftages, came downe to the rivers fide to washe them, in a quiet place where the streame ranne but gently, without any force or swiftnes at all. When they were there, and saw they had no garde about them, nor any came that waye, nor yet any botes going vp nor down the streame: they had a defire to swime ouer the river, which rane with a swift streame, & was maruelous deepe. Some faye, that one Chelia swamme the river vpon her horse backe, & that she did imbolden The boldenes

D & incorage the other to swimme hard by her horse side: & recourring the other bancke, and of Clelia and being paft all daunger, they went & prefented them sclues before Publicola the Consul. Who neither commended them, nor liked the parte they had played, but was maruelous forie, fea- gines ring least men would judge him lesse carefull to keepe his faith, then was king Porsena: & that he might suspect the boldnes of these maidens, was but a crafty slight deuised of the Romar-NES. Therefore he tooke them all againe, & fent them immediatly vnto king Porfena. Whereof Tarquine having intelligence, he layed an ambushe for them, that had the conduction of them. Who so some as they were paste the river, did shew them selves, & brake vpon the Ro-MAINES: they being farre fewer in number than the other, did yet very flowtely defend them selues. Now whilest they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and E three of her fathers feruants, escaped through the middest of them, and saued them selues. The refidue of the virgines remained in the middest among their swordes, in great daunger of their lives. Aruns king Porfenas sonne advertised hereof, ranne thither incotinently to the rescue: but when he came, the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their iorney to redeliuer their oftages. Porfena seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that beganne first to passe the river, and had encouraged the other to followe her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clelia. He looked vpon her very earnestly, and with a pleafaunt countenaunce, and commaunded they should bring him one of his best horse in the stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and so he gaue it vnto her. Those which holde opinion that none but Clalia passed the river a horse backe, doe alledge this to proue F their opinion true. Other doe denie it saying that this THYSCAN king, did onely honour her noble courage. Howfoeuer it was they fee her image a horfe backe in the holy streete, as they goe to the palace: & some saye it is the statue of Valeria, other of Clalia . After Porsena theRomaines.

had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking up his campe, he shewed his noble A minde vnto them in many other things, and specially in that he commaunded his fouldiers they (hould carie nothing but their armour and weapon only, leauing his campe full of corne, vittells, and other kynde of goodes. From whence this custome came, that at this daye when they make open fale of anything belonging to the common weale, the fergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porsenas goodes, and taken of thankefullnes and perpetuall memorie of his bowntie and liberalitie towards them. Further, Porfenas image standethadiovning to the palace where the Senate is vied to be kept, which is made of great antike worke. Afterwardes the SABYNES inuading the ROMAINES territorie with a great Marcus Va- force, Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then chosen Consul, with one Posthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all matters of weight and importaunce passed by Publicolaes counsell and au-B thoritie, who was present at any thing that was done: and by whose meanes Marcus his brother, wanne two great battells, in the last whereof he slewe thirteene thousand of his enemies. not losing one of his owne men. For which his victories, besides the honour of triumphe he ther of Pu- had, the people also at their owne charges, built him a house, in the streete of mounte Palatine, and graunted him moreouer that his doore thould open outwards into the streete, where all others mens doores dyd open inwards into their house: fignifying by graunte of this honour and priviledge, that he should allwayes have benefit by the common weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houses in olde time, dyd all open outwards after that facion, & they doe coiecture it by the comedies that are played. Where those that would goe out of their houses, dyd first knocke at their doores, and make a noyse within the house, C least in opening their doore vpon a sodaine, they might ouerthrowe or hurte him that taried at the streete doore, or passed by the wave: who hearing the noyse, had warning straight to auoyde the daunger. The next yere after that, Publicola was chosen Conful the fourth time, bicause they stoode in great doubt that the Sabynes and Latines would in the together to make warres vpon them: befides all this, there was a certaine superstitious feare ranne through the cittie, of some ill happe toward it, bicause most parte of the women with childe were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking some one limme or other, & all of them came before their time. Wherfore Publicola looking in fome of Sybillaes books, made private facrifice vnto Pluto, & did fet vp againe some feastes & solemne games that were left of, & had bene commaunded before time to be kept by the oracle of Apollo. These meanes having a little rejoyced the cittle D with good hope, bicause they thought that the anger of the goddes had bene appealed: Publicola then begane to prouide for the daugers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in all places, & made great preparation to inuade them. Nowe there was at that time amongest the SABYNES, a great riche man called Appius Clausus, very strong and active of bodie, & otherwise a man of great reputation & cloquence, aboue all the rest of his countrie men: but notwithstading, he was much enuied, and could not auoyde it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to staye those intended warres against the ROMAINES. Whereupon, many which before tooke occasion to murmure against him, dyd nowe much more increase the same: with saying he sought to mainteine the power of the ROMAINES, that afterwards by their ayde he might make him selfe ty- E ranne & King of the countrie. The common people gaue easy eare vnto such speaches, & Appius perceyuing well enough how the fouldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine, & accuse him. Wherefore being well backed & stoode to by his kynsemen, friends, and followers, he practised to make a sturre among the SABYNES, which was the cause of staying the warres against the Romaines. Publicola, also for his parte was very diliget, not only to vnderstad the originall cause of his sedition, but to seede on further & increase the same, having gotten men meete for the purpose, which caried Appius such a message from him. That Publicola knewe very well he was a just man, and one that would not be reuenged of his cittizens, to the generall hurte of his countrie, although the injuries he received at their hands, deliuered him iust occasion to doe it : neuertheles if he had any desire to prouide for his F fafety and to repaire to ROME, leaving them which causeles wished him so muche euill, they would both openly and privately receyue him with that due honour which his ver-

A tue deserved and the worthines of the ROMAINE people required. Clauses having long and many times confidered this matter with him felfe, refolued that it was the best waye he could rake, making vertue of necessitie: & therefore being determined to doe it, he dyd procure his friends to doe as he dyd, & they got other also vnto them, so that he brought awaye with him out of the countrie of the SABYNES, flue thousand families with their wives and children (of figure of the the quietest and most peacible people among the SABYNES) to dwel at ROME. Publicola being dwel at Rome. advertised thereof before they came, dyd receyue them at their comming to Rome with great jove, and all manner of good curteous enterteinment. For at their first coming, he made them all and their families free cittizens, & assigned vnto every persone of them two ingera of lande, (which coteined one acre, one roude, eleuen pole, & 69. partes of a pole) by the river of Tyber: B & vnto Appius self he gaue him 25. iugera (towit, 16. acres & 4. pole, 16. acres & a halfe, 4. pole & 76, partes of apole) & received him into the nuber of the Senatours. And thus came he first whto the gouernment of the common weale in Rome, where he did so wisely behave him self, that in the end he came to be the chiefest man of dignitie & authoritie in Rome, so long as he liued. After his death, he left behind him the familie of the Claudians, desceding fro him: which for honour, and worthines, gaue no place to the noblest familie in Rome. But nowe the fedition amongest the SABYNES being pacified, by the departure of those that were gone to diame. ROME: the feditious governours would not fuffer those that remained to line in peace, but still cried out, it were to much shame for them, that Clause being a fugitive, and become an enemie, should honour their enemies abroade, that being present durst not shewe so much at home, and that the Romaine's should scape vnreuenged, who had done them such apparant wronges. So they raised great force and power, and went and encamped with their armie neere the cittie of FIDENES, and layed an ambushe harde by ROME, in certen hidden and hollowe places, where they put a two thousand choyce footemen, very well armed, and dyd appoint the next morning to fend certaine light horse men to runne and praye to Rome gates: commaunding them, that when the ROMAINES came out of the cittle to charge them, they should feeme leviurely to retire, untill they had drawen them within daunger of their ambush. Publicola receyuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traytour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priuie ambushe, and so deuided his armie in two partes: for he gaue his fonne in lawe Posthumius Balbus, three thousand footemen, n whom he fent awaye by night, commaunding them the fame night to take the hilles, in the bottome whereof the SABYNES were layed in ambushe. Lucretius, fellowe Confull with Publicola, having the lightest and lustiest men of the cittie, was appointed to make head against the vautcurriers of the SABYNES, that minded to approache the gates. And Publicola with the rest of the armie, marched a great compasse about to inclose his enemies behinde. The next morning betimes by chaunce it was a thick mifte, & at that prefent time Post humius coming down from the hilles, with great showtes, charged them that laye in ambush. Lucretino on the other fide, fet vpon the light horsemen of the SABYNES: & Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all fides the SABYNES enterprise had very ill successes for they had the worst in every place. & the ROMAINES killed them flying, without any turning againe to make relistance. Thus the p place which gaue them hope of best safety, turned most to their deadly ouerthrowe. For euery one of their companies supposing the other had bene whole & vnbroken, when a charge was geuen vpon them, dyd ftraight breake, & neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemie. For they that were in the campe, ranne toward them which laye in ambushe: & those which were in ambushe on the contrarie side, ranne towards them that were in cape. So that in flying, the one met with the other, and founde those, towards whom they were flying to have bene fafe, to stand in as much neede of helpe as them selves . That which saved fome that were not flaine, was the cittle of Fidenes, which was neere the campe, and specially faued those which fled thither. But such as came shorte of the cittie, and could not in time recouer it, were all flaine in the fielde, or taken prisoners. As for the glorie of this ho-E norable victorie, albeit the ROMAINES were wonte to afcribe all fuche great notable matters to the speciall providence and grace of the goddes, yet at that time notwithstanding they dyd iudge, that this happy fuccesse fell out by the wife foresight and valliantnes

SOLON and PVBLICOLA. 120 of the captaine. For every man that had ferued in this jorney, had no other talke in his A mouth, but that Publicola had delivered their enemies into their handes, lame, and blinde, and as a man might fave, bounde hande and feete to kill them at their pleasure. The people were maruelously enriched by this victorie, as well for the spoile, as for the ransome of the prisoners that they had gotten. Nowe Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernment of the cittie to those, which were chosen Consuls for the yere following: dyed incontinently, having lived as honorably and vertuoufly all the dayes of his life, as any man living might

doe. The people then tooke order for his funeralles, that the charges thereof should be defrayed by the cittie, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene still debters vnto him for the noble seruice he had done vnto the state and common weale whilest he lived. Therefore towardes his funeralle charges, every cittizen gave a pece B of money called a Quatrine. The women also for their parte, to honour his funeralles, agreed among them felues to mourne a whole yere in blackes for him, which was a great and honorable memoriall. He was buried also by expresse order of the people, within the cittie, in the streate called Velia: and they graunted priviledge also vnto all his posteritie, to be buried in the felfe same place. How beit they doe no more burie any of his there. But when any dye. they bring the corfe vnto this place, and one holding a torche burning in his hande, doth put it vnder the place, and take it straight awaye againe, to shewe that they have libertie to burie him there, but that they willingly refuse this honour: and this done, they carie the corfe awaye againe.

THE COMPARISON OF

OWE presently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not founde in any E other of their lines which we have written of before. And the fame is, that the one hath bene a witnes, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like . So as the sentence that Solon spake to king Crassus, touching Tellus felicitie & happines, might have better bene applied vnto Publicola, than to Tellus: whom he judged to be very happy, bicause he dyed honorably, he had liued vertuously, and had left behinde him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellencie, or vertue, in any of his poemes: neither dyd he euer beare any honorable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowme after his death. Whereas Publicola fo long as he lived, was allwayes the chief man amongest the F ROMAINES, of credit and authoritie: and afterwards fince his death, certaine of the noblest families, and most auncient houses of Rome, in these our dayes, as the Publicoles, the Messales,

A 8the VALERIAN S. for fix hundred yeres continuance, doe referre the glorie of the nobilisie & auncietie of their house vnto him Furthermore, Tellu was flaine by his enemies fighting valliantly like a worthy honest man, But, Publicala died after he had slaine his enemies: which is farremore great good happe, then to be flaine, For after he as generall had honorably ferued his country in the warres, & had left them conquerers, having in his life time received all hot nours & triumphes due vnto his service: he attained to that happy end of life, which Solen accompted & esteemed, most happy & blessed. Also in withing manner, he would his end should be lamented to his prayle, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuaunce of mans life by faying:

Let not my death wwithout lamenting paffe, but rather let my friendes bewvayle the same: Whose grieuous teares, and cries of out alas, maye ofte resound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good happe, then most happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinsefolkes, but the whole cittie also, and many a thousand persone besides, dyd bitterly bewayle the loffe of him. For all the women of Rome dyd mourne for him in blacks, and dyd most pittiefully lament his death, as euery one of them had lost either father, brother, or True it is that I couet goodes to have: husband.

Solon fayeth this, bicause vengeance followed ill gotten good. And Publicola tooke great C heede, not only to get his goodes most justly, but had regarde that those which he had the fpent most honestly in helping the needle . So that if Solon was justly reputed the wisest man, we must needes confesse also that Publicola was the happicst. For what the one desired for the greatest and most perfect good, a man can haue in this worlde: the other hath wonne it, kept it, and vied it all his life time, vntill the hower of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done like vnto Solon, shewing him felf a perfect example and looking glaffe, where men maye fee howe to gouerne a popular state: when he made his Confulshippe voyde of all pride & stately shewe, and became him self affable, curteous, and beloued of euerie bodie. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes. As when he ordeined, that the people only should have authoritie to choose and create, all common officers and magistrates, D and that they might appeale from any judge to the people: as Solon when he suffered them to appeale vnto the judges of the people. In deede Publicola dyd not create any newe Senate as Solon dyd: but he dyd augment the first number, with as many persones almost as there were before. He dyd also first erect the office of Quastores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other Publicolarcollections of money. Bicause the chiefest magistrate, if he were an honest man, should not for netted the offolightan occasion be taken, from the care of better and more weightie affayers: and if he fore. were wickedly genen and ill disposed, that he should have no such meane or occasion to worke his wicked will, by having the treasure of the cittie in his handes, and to commaund what he lyst. Moreouer in hating the tyranes, Publicola therein was farre more sharpe & terrible. For Solon in his lawes punished him that went about to make him selfe tyranne, yet after E he was connicted thereof by lawe: but Publicola ordeined that they should kill him before the lawe dyd passe on him, that sought to be King. And where Solon iustly, and truely vaunteth him felf, that being offered to be King & Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole confent of the cittizens: yet he dyd notwithstanding refuse it. This vaunte and glorie is as due vnto Publicola: who finding the dignitie of a Conful tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauora fa And it feemeth that Solon knewe before him, what was the true and direct waye to gouerne a common weale vprightly. For he fayeth in one place:

Both great and small of powver the better will obaye: if we to litle or to much whon them doe not laye.

The discharging of dettes was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie, For litle preuayleth lawe to make equalitie among cittizens, when dettes doe hinder the poore people to enjoye the benefit thereof. And where it feemeth that they have most liber-tie, as in that they maye be chosen judges and officers to speake their opinion in the counself and gene their voyces also: there in deede are they most bounde and subject, bicause they doe but obaye the rich, in all they doe commaund. But yet in this acte there is a thinge more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted. That commonly discharging of dettes, was wont to breede great tumultes, and feditions in common weales. And Solon having vied it in a very good time(as the philitian ventring a daungerous medecine) dyd appeale the ledition already begonne, and did veterly quenche through his glorie, and the common opinion they had of his wisdome and vertue, all the infamie and accusation that might have growen of that acte. As for their first entrie into the gouernment, Solons beginning was farre more noble. For he went before, and followed not another: and him felfe alone without any others helpe, dyd put in execution the best, and more parte of all his notable and goodly lawes . Yet was Publicolate ende and death much more glorious and happie. For Solon before he dyed, fawe all his comon wealthe ouerthrowen: but Publicolaes common weale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broyle of ciuill warres beganne againe among them . Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wodden tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his waye immediatly out of the cittle of Athens, Publicola abiding continually in Rome governing the state, dyd throughly stablishe & confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon having wifely forfeene Pisitratus practises, aspiring to make him selse King: he could neuer let him for all that, but was him selfe ouercome and oppressed with the tyrannie he sawe stablished in his owne fight, and in dispight of him. Where Publicola ouerthrewe and dyd put downe a mightie Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly stablished: his vertue and de-C fire being equall with Solons, & having had belides fortune favorable, and sufficient power to execute, his vertuous and well disposed minde. But as for warres and marshall deedes, there is no comparison to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plataian, doth not attribute the warres of the Megarians vnto Solon, as we have written it: where Publicola being generall of an armie, and fighting himselfe in persone, hath wonne many great battells. And as for matters of peace and civill government, Solon never durst present him self openly to persuade the enterprise of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfeat madnes, and as a foole to make sporte, Where Publicola taking his aduenture from the beginning, thewed him felfe without diffimulation, an open enemie to Tarquine, and afterwardes he reuealed all the whole conspiracie. And when he had bene the only cause and autor of punishing the traitours, he dyd not only D driue out of Rome the tyrannes selues in persone, but tooke from them also all hope of returne againe. Who having allwayes thus nobly & valliantly behaued him felf without shrinking backe, or flying from ought that required force, a manly corage, or open resistaunce: dyd yet shewe him selfe discreete, where wisedome was requisite, or reason and persuasion needefull. As when he conningly wanne king Porfena, who was a dredfull enemie vnto him, and inuincible by force: whom he handled in such good forte, that he made him his friend . Peraduenture some might stand in this and saye: that Solon recoursed the Ile of SALAMINA VIIO the ATHENIANS, which they would have lost . Publicola to the contrarie, restored the lands vnto Porfena againe, which the Romaines had conquered before, within the countrie of THYSCAN . But the times in which these things were done, are allwayes to be considered of. E For a wife gouernour of a Realme, and politicke man, doth gouerne diverfely according to the occasions offred, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale. And many times, in letting goe one thing, he faueth the whole: and in lofing a litle, he gayneth much . As Publicola dyd: who losing a little pece of another mans countrie which they had vsurped, saued by that ouercome, and haue fentence paffe of his fide. For the King their enemie dyd not only make peace with them, but dydalfo leave them all his furniture, prouision, and munition for the F warres: euen for the vertue, manhood, and inflice, which the great wifedome of this Conful very much for them, to faue their cittie only: he got them moreouer, all the goodes that were rell, he wane the victorie: winning that moreouer, which he would gladly haue geuen to haue

Themistocles.

HEMISTOCLES parentage dyd litle aduaunce his glorie: for his father Neocles was of small reputation in ATHENS, being of the hunodred of Phrear, & tribe of Leontis: of his mother an allien or straunger: as these verses doe witnesse, Abrotonon I am yborne in Thracia, and yet this highe good happe I have that into Grecia: I haue brought forth a fonne, Themistocles by name, the glorie of the Greekishe bloods, and man of greatest fame. Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the countrie of CARIA: and they doe not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpe. And B Neanthes fayeth furthermore, that she was of HALICARNASS VS, the chiefest cittle of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cause when the straungers dyd affemble at Cynosargos (a place of cynosargos, a exercise without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, place of exercise without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, place of exercise without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themistocles persuaded divers youthes of the most new world the themselves and the most new world the mos honourable houses, to goe down with him, & to annointe them selues at Cynosargos, conningly colles.

thereby taking away the differece betwene the right & alien forte. But fetting a parte all thefe circumstaunces, he was no doubt allied vnto the house of the Lycomedians: for Themistocles caused the chappell of this familie, which is in the village of Phiyes, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be buylt vp againe at his owne charges: and as Simonides (ayeth, he dyd fet it forth and enriche it with pictures. Moreouer euery man doth confesse it, that euen from C his childhood they dyd perceyue he was geuen to be very whotte headed, sturring, wise, and of good spirite, and enterprising of him selfe to doe great things, and borne to rule weighty somethin. causes. For at such dayes and howers as he was taken from his booke, and had leaue to playe, he neuer played, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they allwayes founde him conning some oration without booke, or making it alone by him selfe, and the ground of his matter was euer comonly, either to defend, or accuse some of his companions. Whereupon his schoolemaster obseruing him, ofte sayed vnto him: suer some great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boye, for it cannot be chosen but that one daye thou shalt doe some notable good thing, or fome extreme mischief. Therefore when they went about to teache him any A thing, only to checke his nature, or to facion him with good manner and civilitie, or to studie any matter for pleasure or honest pastime : he would flowly and carelesly learne of them, But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state: they sawe he would beate at it marueloufly, and would vnderstande more then any could of his age and cariage, trusting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cause, that being mocked afterwardes by some that had studied humanitie, and other liberall sciences, he was driven for reuenge and his owne defence, to aunswer with great and stowte wordes, faying, that in deede he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to playe of a pfalterion : but if they dyd put a cittle into his handes that was of small name, weake, and little, he knewe wayes enough how to make it noble, stronge, and great. Neuertheles, Stesimbrotus writeth, how he went to Ana- B Themistocles xagoras schoole, and that vnder Melissus he studied naturall philosophie. But herein he was greatly deceaued, for that he tooke no great hede vnto the time. For Melissus was captaine of this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themistocles, and Anaxagor as dwelt with Pericles in his owne house. Therefore we have better reason and occasion to beleeue those that write, speache, and by litle and litle haue translated the exercise of deedes, vnto bare and curious thould be. Other tales which some will seeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As D that his father dyd difinherite him, and that his mother for very care and forowe she tooke to fee the lewde life of her fonne, dyd kill her felf. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being defirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, dyd goe and shewe him all a-longest the sea shore, the shippewracks and ribbes of olde gallyes cast here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and fayed to him: thus the people vie their gouernours, when they can serue no lenger. How soeuer it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gaue him self to state, and was sodainely taken with desire of glorie. For euen at his first entrie, bicause he would fet foote before the prowdest, he stoode at pyke against the greatest and mightiest per-fones, that bare the swaye and gouernment, and specially against Aristides, Lysimachus sonne, he conceyued toward him, came of a very light cause . For they both loued Stesslaw, that was borne in the cittie of TEO s, as Ariston the philosopher writeth. And after this iealousie was kindled betweene them, they allwayes tooke contrary parte one against another, not only in their private likings, but also in the government of the comon weale. Yet I am persuaded, that the difference of their manners & conditions, did much encrease the grudge and discorde betwext them . For Ariftides being by nature a very good man, a just dealer, & honest of life, and one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor ferue his owne glorie, but rather who euer encountered him, and was still his aduersarie opposite. Yet it seemeth the euil will E was Anaxaliffing schollers, the Samians against Pericles, at what time he dyd laye seige vnto the cittle of Samos Now Mnefichilus Themistocles dyd determine to followe Mnesiphilus Phrearian. For he was no professed Orator, nor natural philosopher, as they termed it in that time; but made profession of that which then they called wifedome. Which was no other thing, but a certen knowledge to VVhat rife. handle great causes, and an indeuour to have a good wit and judgment in matters of state and gouernment: which profession beginning in Solon, dyd continue, and was taken vp from man C to man, as a secte of philosophie. But those that came sithence, haue mingled it with arte of wordes: whereupon they were called Sophisters, as who would saye, counterfeate wife men.

Notwithstanding, when Themistocles beganne to medle with the gouernment of the common weale, he followed much Mnesiphilus. In the first parte of his youth, his hehauiour and doings Themistocles were very light and vnconstant, as one caried awaye with a rashe head, and without any order or discretion: by reason whereof his manners & conditions seemed maruelously to chaunge, and oftimes fell into very ill fauored euents, as him felf dyd afterwards confesse by saying: that a ragged colte of times proues a good horse, specially if he be well ridden, and broken as he

to the contrary would doe, would fave, & counfaill all wayes for the most benefit & comoditie of the commo weale: was oftenmes enforced to reful Themistocles, & disapoint his ambition, being euer busilie mouing the people, to take some new matter in hande. For they reporte of F him, that he was so inflamed with defire of glorie, & to enterprise great matters, that being but a very youg man at the battell of Marathon, where there was no talke but of the worthines of captaine

A captaine Militades that had wonne the battellihe was found many times folicarilie there alone deuising with him self: besides, they saye he could then take no rest in the night, neither would goe to playes in the daye time, nor would keepe companie with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that wouldred to fee him fo in his muses, and chaunged, and asked him what he ayled: that Miltiades victorie would not let him fleepe, bicause other thought this ouerthrowat MARATHON, would have made an end of all warres. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daylie studied howe to preuent them, and how to see to the fafetie of GREECE. & before occasion offered, he did exercise his cittie in feats of warre, forefeeing what should followe after. Wherefore, where the cittizes of ATHEN'S before dyd vse to B deuide among them selues the reuenue of their mines of silver, which were in a parte of Ar-

TIC A called LAVRION: he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & persuade them, Themistocles that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among them selues, & employe the contributions money of the same in making of gallyes, to make warres against the Æ G I NET ES. For their make gallyes, warres of all GREECE were most cruell, bicause they were lords of the sea. & had so great a nuber of shippes. This persuasion drue the cittizens more easely to Themistocles minde, than the threatning them with king Darius, or the Persians would have done: who were farre from them, & not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this oportunitie taken of the hatred & iealousse betwene the ATHENIANS & the #GINETES, made the peopleto agree, of the faid money to make an hundred gallyes, with which they fought against king Xerxes, & did C ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wanne the cittizes by degrees to bende their force to sea, declaring vinto them, howe by lande they were scant able to The Ashemake heade against their equalles, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defende nide bit their them selves from the barbarous people but more over the able to company dell Grane a Hone force to sea. them selves from the barbarous people, but moreover be able to comaund all GRECE. Here-by Themistoupon he made them good mariners, & paffing fea men, as Plato fayeth, where before they were cles perfueflowte & valliant fouldiers by lande. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teethe af-flow. terwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, & had brought them to the bake & the ower: & so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inveyed against him in that, as Stefimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this fea feruice to passe, whether thereby he dyd ouerthrow the justice of the como weale or not. I leave that D to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preservation of all GRECE stoode at that time vpo the fea, & that the gallyes only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe: Xerxes him self is a sufficient witnes, besides other proofes that might be brought thereof. For his armie by lade being yet whole, & vnfet on, when he faw his armie by fea broken, difperfed, & founcke, he fled straight vpon it, confessing as it were that he was nowe to weake to deale any more with the GREECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenant in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GREECIANS should not followe him, then for any hope he had to ouercome the. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his own profit, & carefull to Themistocles looke to his things: for he dyd spende liberally, & loued ofte to make sacrifices, & honorably to agordhaubad receyue & entertaine straugers: wherefore he had good reason to be carefull to get, to defraye his traugers. E his charges. Other to the cotrary, blame him much, that he was to nere, & miserable: for some faye, he would fell prefents of meate that were geuen him. He dyd aske one Philides on a time, which had a brede of mares, a colte of gifte: who denying him flatly he was fo angrie, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wodde, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him understande, that he would shortly set strife & quarrel between him, & his nearest kinsemen & familliar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a youg man, & feantly knowen, he earneftly Themistocles intreated one Epicles, borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at exnemely that time the conningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come & teache his arte at his house; and all was no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him

F playe, should aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yere when he went vnto the feast & assembly of the playes Olympicall, he would nedes keepe open house for all commers. haue his tents richely furnished, & a great traine of servants & all other furniture, only to conftone, which he founde there by chaunce, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, A where there was very good harber for shippes, and fit places also to lye in. These were the wordes, that the I o N I A N S should take the GREECIANS partes being their founders and auncesters ,& such as fought for their libertie : or at the least they should trouble the armie of the barbarous people, & doe them all the mischief they could, when the Greecians should come to fight with them. By these words he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their parte, or at the least he should make the barbarous people realous & mistrustfull of them. Xer. xes being already entred in the vppermost parte of the prouince of Dorica, into the countrie of PHOCIDA, burning & destroying the townes & citties of the PHOCIANS: the other GREE-CIANS laye still & suffered the inualion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANS did request them to mete with the barbarous armie in BOEOTIA, to faue the countrie of ATTICA, as before they B had done, when they wet by fea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearke to it in no wife. & all was bicause they were desirous they should drawe to the straite of Peloponnes vs, and there they should assemble the whole strength and power of GREECE within the barre of the fame, & make a strong substantiall walle from the one seato the other. The ATHENIANS were very angrie at this deuise, & were half discoraged & out of harte, to see the selues thus forsake and cast of, by the rest of the Greecians. For it was out of all speache that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies: & therefore their only remedy was to leave their cittie: & to get them to the sea. The people were very viwilling to listen hereuito, making their reckoning it was nedeles to be carefull to ouercome or to faue them felues, having once for faken the teples of their godds, & the graues of their parents. Wherfore Themistocles feeing that C neither reason, nor mans persuasion could bring the people to like his opinion: he beganne to frame a deuise (as men doe vse somtimes in tragedies) & to threaten the ATHENIANS with significant gues from heaven, with oracles & aunswers from the goddes. And the occasion of Minerwaes draggo ferued his turne for a celestiall signe & token, which by good fortune dyd not appeare in those dayes in the teple as it was wont to doe: & the priests found the sacrifices which were daylie offered to him, whole & vntouched by any . Wherefore being enformed by Themistocles what they should doe, they spred a brute abroade amongest the people, that the goddesse Minerua, the protectour & defendour of the cittie, had forfaken it, pointing them the wave vnto the sea. And againe he wanne them by a prophecie, which comaunded them to saue them felues in walles of wodd: faying, that the walles of wodd dyd fignifie nothing els but shippes. D And for this cause he saied, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miserable nor vnfortunate, bicause it should geue the name of a most happy victorie which the GREECIANS should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this decree, that they should leave the cittle of Athens to the custodie of the goddesse Pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country,& that all those which were of age to carie any weapon should get the nion for ske to the gallyes: & for the reft, that every man should see his wife, children, & bondmen placed in them by some five places well as he could A fear this decreases and & could be be could be seen that the could be seen the same of the Themisticles fome fuer place as well as he could. After this decree was past & authorised by the people, the perjusion or most parte of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wines & litle children, into the cittle of Troezen, where the Troezenians receyued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they should be entertained of the comon charge, allowing them a pece, E two obulos of their money a daye, & fuffered the young children to gather fruite wherefoeuer they founde it & furthermore dyd hier schoolemasters at the charge of the comon wealth, to bring them vp at schoole. He that was the pener of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The A THE NIANS at that time, had no como money, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Aristotle fayeth) furnished euery souldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a crafte deuised of Themistocles. The A-THENIANS being come downe vnto the hauen of PIREA, he made as though Pallas tergat (on the which Medufus heade was grauen) had bene loft, & was not found with the image of the goddeffe : and faining to feeke for it, he ranfacked every corner of the gallyes, and founde a great deale of filuer which private persones had hidden among est their fardells. This mo-F ney was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the fouldiers that were shipped had wherewithall, to prouide them of necessary things. When time came that they were

A to departe the hauen, & that all the cittle of ATHENS had taken sea: one waye it was a pittle to beholde them. Another waye it made all fortes to wounder, that confidered the boldnes and corage of those men, which before sent awaye their fathers, and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at the teares, cries, therikes, & limbrafings of their wines, their children, & departures, but flowtly and resolutely helde on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding, there were many olde cittizens left still of necessitie in ATHENS, bicause they could not be remoued for very extreme age, which sturred many with compassion toward them. There was besides, a certen pittie that made mens harts to yerne, when they saw the poore doggs, beafts, & cattell ronne vp & downe bleating, mowing, and howling out alow de after their mafters, in token of forowe, when they dyd imbarke. Amongest these, there goeth a straunge tale of Xan-R thippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for forowe his master had left him behinde him, Xanth dyd cast him self after into the sea, & swimming still by the galleys side wherein his master was, he helde on to the Ile of S A LAM IN A, where so sone as the poore curre laded, his breath sayled him. & dved presently. They saye, at this daye the place called the doggs graue, is the very place The dogge where he was buried. These were strauge acts of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS grave. fory for the absence of Aristides, and searing least of spyte he taking parte with the barbarous nation, might have bene the ruine & distruction of the state of GREECE, being banished five veres also before the warres, by Themistocles procurement: that he dyd fet forth a decree; that Aristides reall those which had bene banished for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to saye, & to moreth from gene counfell to the cittizens in those things, which they thought best for the preservation of banishement C GREECE. And also where Eurybiades, being generall of the GREECIANS whole army by fea, cles decree. for the worthines of the cittle of Sparta, but otherwise a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any case departe from thence, & retire into the goulse of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by lande affembled: that Themistocles withstood him; and did hinder it all he could. At that time also it was, that Themistocles made so notable aun- Notable aunfivers, which specially are noted, & gathered together. For when Eurybiades sayed one day vnto frees of Thehim. Themistocles, those that at playes & games doe rise before the company, are whistled at. It is true, faid Themistocles: but those that tarie last so, doe never winne any game. Another time Eurybiades having a staffe in his hande lift it vp, as though he would have striken him. Strike & thou wilt, faid he, so thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wouldring to see him so paciet, suffered him D then to fave what he would. Then Themistocles beganne to bring him to reason: but one that floode by fayed vnto him. Themistocles for a man that hath neither cittie nor house, it is an ill parte to will others that have, to forfake all. Themistocles turning to him, replied. We have willingly for faken our houses and walles, sayed he, cowardly beaste that thou arte, bicause we would not become flaues for feare to lofe things, that have neither foule nor life. And yet our cittie I tell thee is the greatest of all GREECE: for it is a fleete of two hundred galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to faue you if you lift. But if you will needes goe your waves. & for fake vs the seconde time: you shall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANS haue another free cittie, & have possessed againe as much good land, as that they have already lost. These wordes made Eurybiades presently thincke, and feare, that the ATHENIANS would E not goe, and that they would forfake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reason against Themistocles opinion: he could not but aunswer him . Alas , and must you my masters talke of warres to, that are like to a Sleue? In deede you have a sworde, The Sleue is but you lacke a harte. Some write, that whilest Themistocles was talking thus from his gal- affile facisley, they fpyed an owle flying on the right hande of the shippes, which came to light on and like a one of the mastes of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other GREECIANS dyd agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by fea. But when the flete of their enemies shippes shewed on the coaftes of ATTICA, harde by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the rivers thereabouts, as farre as any bodie could fee, and that king Xerxes him felfe was come in persone with all his army by lande, to campe by the fea fide: fo that his whole power both by lande persuasions, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONNESIANS, considering how they might recouer the goulfe of Paloponnesvs, and they dyd growe very angry, when any man

good thing, or fome extreme mischief. Therefore when they went about to teache him any thing, only to checke his nature, or to facion him with good manner and civilitie, or to studie any matter for pleasure or honest pastime: he would slowly and carelesly learne of them. But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning flate: they fawe he would beate at it marueloufly, and would vnderstande more then any could of his age and cariage, trusting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cause, that being mocked afterwardes by some that had studied humanitie, and other liberall sciences, he was driven for reuenge and his owne defence, to aunswer with great and stowte wordes, saying, that in deede he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to playe of a pfalterion: but if they dyd put a cittie into his handesthat was of small name, weake, and litle, he knewe wayes enough how to make it noble, stronge, and great. Neuertheles, Stefimbrotus writeth, how he went to Ans. B

Themistocles dyd determine to followe Mnesiphilus Phrearian. For he was no professed O-father being defirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, dyd goe and shewe him all alongest the sea shore, the shippewracks and ribbes of olde gallyes cast here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and faved to him: thus the people vie their gouernours, when they can ferue no lenger. Howfoeuer it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gaue him self to state, and was sodainely taken with desire of glorie. For euen at his first entrie, bicause he

For Melissus was captaine of goras & Methe Samians against Pericles, at what time he dyd laye seige vnto the cittie of Samos. Now liffics fcholler. this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themistocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne house. Therefore we have better reason and occasion to beleeve those that write.

of the commo weale: was oftenimes enforced to refult Themistocles, & disapoint his ambition, being euer busilie mouing the people, to take some new matter in hande. For they reporte of F him, that he was so inflamed with desire of glorie, & to enterprise great matters, that being but a very yoog man at the battell of Marathon, where there was no talke but of the worthines of he conceyued toward him, came of a very light cause . For they both loued Stefilaus , that was borne in the cittie of TEOs, as Ariston the philosopher writeth. And after this jealousie was kindled betweene them, they allwayes tooke contrary parte one against another, not only in their private likings, but also in the government of the comon weale. Yet I am persuaded, that the difference of their manners & conditions, did much encrease the grudge and discorde betwext them . For Ariftides being by nature a very good man, a just dealer, & honest of life, and one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor ferue his owne glorie, but rather to the contrary would doe, would fave, & counfaill allwayes for the most benefit & comoditie

A captaine Miltiades that had wonne the battellihe was found many times folitarilie there alone denifing with him felf:besides, they save he could then take no rest in the night; neither would goe to playes in the daye time, nor would keepe companie with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that wouldred to fee him fo in his muses, and chaunged, and asked him what he ayled: that Militades victorie would not let him fleepe, bicause other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would have made an end of all warres. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daylie studied howe to preuent them, and how to see to the fafetie of GREECE, & before occasion offered, he did exercise his cittie in feats of warre, forefeeing what should followe after. Wherefore, where the cittizes of ATHENS before dyd vse to B deuide among them selues the reuenue of their mines of silver, which were in a parte of Ar-

TIC A called LAVRION: he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & persuade them. Themistocles that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among them selues, & employe the contributions money of the same in making of gallyes, to make warres against the Æ G INETES. For their make gallyes, warres of all GREECE were most cruell, bicause they were lords of the sea, & had so great a nu-ber of shippes. This persuasion drue the cittizens more easely to Themistocles minde, than the threatning them with king Darius, or the Persians would have done: who were farre from them, & not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this oportunitie taken of the hatred & icalousie betwene the ATHENIANS & the EGINETES, made the people to agree, of the faid money to make an hundred gallyes, with which they fought against king Xerxes, & did ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wanne the cittizes by degrees to bende their force to fea, declaring vnto them, howe by lande they were feant able to The shiemake heade against their equalles, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defende mids bet their them selues from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to comaund all GRECE. upon he made them good mariners, & paffing fea men, as Plato fayeth, where before they were des perfueflowte & valliant fouldiers by lande. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teethe af-fon. terwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, & had brought being yet whole, & vnset on, when he saw his armie by sea broken, dispersed, & souncke, he sted ftraight vpon it, confessing as it were that he was nowe to weake to deale any more with the GREECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenant in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GREECIANS should not followe him, then for any hope he had to ouercome the. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his own profit, & carefull to Themistocles looke to his things: for he dyd spende liberally, & loued ofte to make sacrifices, & honorably to agood houbad receyue & entertaine straugers: wherefore he had good reason to be carefull to get, to defraye his profit. which had a brede of mares, a colte of gifte: who denying him flatly, he was fo angrie, that he quarrel betweet him, & his nearest kinsemen & familliar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a young man, & scantly knowen, he earnefely Themistocles intreated one Epicles, borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at exmember that time the conningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come & reache playe, should aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yere when he went your the feaft & affembly of the playes Olympicall, he would nedes keepe open house for all commers, haue his tents richely furnished, & a great traine of feruants & all other furniture, only to con-threatned him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wodde, with the which

TROTA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him understande, that he would shortly set strife& tende with Cimon. This marueloufly spighted the GREECIANS, who thought Themistocles ex. A pences fit for Cimons countenance, & abilitie, bicause he was a young gentleman, and of a noble house: but for him that was but a new come man, & would be are a greater porte, then either became his calling or abilitie, they thought it not only vnallowable in him, but meere presumption & vaine glorie. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedie which was played openly: & being fet out therein to haue wonne the prife, & the ATHENIANS being maruelous desirous of the honour in such playes, he caused this victorie of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate & fet vp in a temple, with this infeription. Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynicus made it: Adimantus vvas chief ruler. Yet notwithstading he was well taken of the common people, partly bicause he would speake to enery cittizen by his fently to imbarke his cittizens into gallyes, declaring to them they should leaue their cittie,& goe mete with the barbarous King by fea, so farre fro the coast of GREECE as they could: but the people did not thincke that good. Wherefore he led great numbers of fouldiers by lande, E into the countrie of TEMPES with the LACED EMONIANS, to keepe the passage & entrie into THESS ALIE, against the barbarous people, which countrie stoode yet sownde to GREECE, & not revolted to the MEDES. Afterwards the GRECIANS coming fro thence without any acte done, and the Thessalians also being wonne somewhat on the Kings side, for that all the whole country vnto Boro TIA was at the deuotion & goodwill of the barbarous people: then the ATHENIANS beganne to finde howe Themistocles opinion to fight by fea was very good. Wherupon they fent him with their naule to the cittle of ARTEMISIVN, to kepe the straight. There the other GRECIANS would have had the LACED EMONIANS & their admirall Eurybiades to have had the authoritie & comaundement of the rest. But the Athen I and would not fet sayle vnder any other admirall then their own, bicause theirs were the greatest number F of shippes in the armie, & aboue all the other GRECIANS. Themistocles foreseing the daunger that was likely to fall out amongest them selues, dyd willingly yelde the whole authoritie vnto name, no man telling him their names: and partly also bicause he shewed him self an ypright B iudge in priuate mens causes. As one daye he aunswered the poet Simonides, borne in CHIO, who dyd request an vnreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernour of A wife faring the cittie. Thou couldest be no good poet, Simonides, if thou diddest finge against the rules of of Themister mulike:neither my felf a good gouernour of a citie, if I should doe any thing against the lawe. And mocking the fame Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to speake ill of not wife to make him felf to be drawen, being so deformed & ill fauored. But being growne in Themisticles credit, & having wone the fauour of the people, he was such an enemy to Aristides, that in the made Athens, for 5 yeres. Who newes were brought that the king of Persia was onwardes on his iorney & coming downe to make warres ypon C. the Greecians: the Athenians cosulted whom they should make their generall. And it is reported, that all their comon counsellers which were wont to speake in matters, fearing the daunger, dyd drawe backe, saue an orator called Epicydes, Euphemides sonne, very eloquent in grain fued to speache, but somewhat womanishe, fainte harted, & gredie of money, offred him self to sue for this charge, & had some hope to obteine it. Wherefore Themistocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this man to be generall of the armie, he bought out Epicydes ambitio with ready money, & fo made him let fall his fute. It fell out Themistocles was greatly comeded, about that ded the empire of the GREECIANS both by fea & lande, that they should acknowledge obedience to the King. For he caused him to be taken, & put to death by a comon cosent, for vsing D the Greeke tongue in the service & comaundement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing also, that at his motion, Arthmius born at Zelea, was noted of infamie, both he his children, & all his posteritie after him, bicause he brought gold fro the king of PERSIA, to corrupt & winne the GREECIANS. But the greatest & worthiest acte he did in those parts, was this that he pacified all civill warres among the GREECIANS, perfuading the citties to leave of their

Eurybiades, & got the ATHENIANS to agree vnto it: affuring them, that if they behaued them selves valliatly in these warres, the other GREECIANS of their own accordewould afterwards submit them selues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the originall cause of the fauing of GREBCE, & dyd most aduquince the honour and glorie of the ATHENIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, & their frieds & allies with liberalitie. In the meane time, Eurybiades seing the barbarous slete riding at anker, all alongest the Ile of Apheres, with such a great nuber of thippes in the vaward, he begane to be affrayed. And understading moreouer, there were other 200 sayle that wet to cast about the Ile of SCIATHE, & fo to come in the presently would have retired further into GREECE, & would have drawe necrer vnto Peloponne sys, to the end their army by sea might be neare their army by lade, as thinking it vnpossible to fight with king Xerxes power by sea. Whereupo the inhabitants of the Ile of EVBOEA, fearing least the GRECIANS would to the spoyle of the enemy, they caused Themistocles secretly to be spoke with all, & sent him a good some of money by one called Pelagon. Themistocles tooke the money, as Herodotus writeth, & gauc it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amogest the ATHENIANS, captaine of the galley called the holy galley, that was much against Themistocles intended purpose: who having no money to paye his mariners, dyd what he could that they might departe with speede from thence. Themistocles sturred up then his souldiers more against him then before, insomuch as they wet aborde his galley, & tooke his supper from him. Architeles being maruelous angrie & offeded withall, Themistocles fent him both bread & meat in a panier, & in the bottome thereof he had o put a talent of filuer, bidding him for that night to suppe with that, and the next morning he should prouide for his mariners, or els he would coplaine, & accuse him to the cittizes that he had take money of the enemies. Thus it is writte by Phanias Lesbia. Moreouer these first fights in the straite of Evboen, between the Greecians, & the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the warres between them. For it was but a taste gene vnto them, which serued the GREECIANS turne very much, by making them to fee by experiece, & the manner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of thippes, nor the pope & fumptuous fetting out of the same, nor the prowde barbarous showts & songes of victorie that could stande them to purpose, against noble harts & valliat minded souldiers, that durst grapple with them, & come to hands strokes with their enemies: & that they should make no reckoning of all that brauery & bragges, but should sticke to it like men, & laye it on the lacks of them. The which (as it seemeth) the poet Pindarus vnderstoode very well, when he sayed touching the battell of ARTE-The stownte Athenians, have nouve foundation layed, MISIVM. unto the libertie of Greece, by thes assaults assayed. For out of doubt the beginning of victorie, is to be hardie. This place ARTEMISIVE is a The coaft of

There is a litle temple of Diana, surnamed Orientall round about the which there are trees, and a compasse of pillers of white stone, which when a man rubbes with his hande, they shewe of the culler and sauour of safferne. And in E one of those pillers there is an inscription of lamentable verses to this effect. When boldest bloods of Athens by their might beganne to builde this noble monument: and to Diane the same they dyd present, had ouercome the numbers infinite for that they had the Medes like vvife subdued, of Mia: they then in memorie, er with their bloud their hardy hands embrued. of all their dedes and valliant victorie There is a place seene also vpon that coast at this daye, a good wave into the lande, in the middest whereof are great sands full of blacke dust as alhes: and they thincke that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and olde shippwracks. Newes being brought what had bene done in the countrie of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerwes had wonne that entry into GREECE by lande: the GREECIANS then brought their whole F army by fea more into GREECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retire, as me whose hartes were lifte up with the glorie of their former valliant dedes . Nowe Themistocles Themistocles passing by those places where he knewe the enemies must of necessitie fall vpon the lee shore francement

stone, which he founde there by chaunce, or purposely brought thither for that purpose A where there was very good harber for shippes, and fit places also to lye in . These were the wordes, that the I o N I A N S should take the GREECIANS partes being their founders and auncesters, & such as fought for their libertie: or at the least they should trouble the armie of the barbarous people, & doe them all the mischief they could, when the GREECIANS should come to fight with them. By these words he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their parte, or at the least he should make the barbarous people iealous & mistrustfull of them. Xerxes being already entred in the vppermost parte of the province of Dorica, into the countrie of PHOCIDA, burning & destroying the townes & cittles of the PHOCIANS: the other GREE-CIANS laye still & suffered the inuation, notwithstanding the ATHENIANS did request them to mete with the barbarous armie in BOEOTIA, to faue the countrie of ATTICA, as before they ! had done, when they wet by fea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearke to it in no wife. & all was bicause they were desirous they should drawe to the straite of Peloponnes vs, and there they should assemble the whole strength and power of GREECE within the barre of the same, & make a strong substantiall walle from the one seato the other. The ATHENIANS were very angrie at this deuise, & were half discoraged & out of harte, to see the selues thus for sake and cast of, by the rest of the GREECIANS. For it was out of all speache that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies: & therefore their only remedy was, to leave their cittie: & to get them to the fea. The people were very vnwilling to liften hereuto, making their reckoning it was nedeles to be carefull to ouercome, or to faue them selues, having once for faken the teples of their godds. & the graues of their parents. Wherfore Themistocles feeing that C neither reason, nor mans persuasion could bring the people to like his opinion; he beganne to frame a deuise (as men doe vie somtimes in tragedies) & to threaten the Athenians with signes from heaven, with oracles & aunswers from the goddes. And the occasion of Mineruaes draggo ferued his turne for a celestiall signe & token, which by good fortune dyd not appeare in those dayes in the teple as it was wont to doe: & the priests found the sacrifices which were daylie offered to him, whole & vntouched by any . Wherefore being enformed by Themistoeles what they should doe, they spred a brute abroade amongest the people, that the goddesse Minerua, the protectour & defendour of the cittie, had forfaken it, pointing them the wave vnto the sea. And againe he wanne them by a prophecie, which comaunded them to saue them felues in walles of woodd faying, that the walles of woodd dyd fignifie nothing els but shippes. D And for this cause he faied, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diume, not miserable nor vnfortunate, bicause it should geue the name of a most happy victorie which the GREEGIANS should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this decree, that they should leave the cittie of ATHENS to the custodie of the goddesse Pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country, & that all those which were of age to carie any weapon should get the nian for fake to the gallyes: & for the rest, that every man should see his wife, children, & bondmen placed in Themiffeeler some suer place as well as he could. After this decree was past & authorised by the people the persusfien, es most parte of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wives & little children, into die geenthe the cittie of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS receyued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they should be entertained of the comon charge, allowing them a pece, E two obulos of their money a daye, & fuffered the young children to gather fruite wherefoeuer they founde it:& furthermore dyd hier schoolemasters at the charge of the comon wealth, to bring them vp at schoole. He that was the pener of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time, had no como money, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Aristotle fayeth)furnished euery souldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a crafte deuised of Themistocles. The A-THENIANS being come downe unto the hauen of PIREA, he made as though Pallas tergat (on the which Medusus heade was grauen) had bene lost, & was not found with the image of the goddesse: and faining to seeke for it, he ransacked every corner of the gallyes, and sounde a great deale of filuer which private persones had hidden amongest their fardells. This mo-F ney was brought out vnto the people', and by this meanes the fouldiers that were shipped had wherewithall, to prouide them of necessary things. When time came that they were

A to departe the hauen, & that all the cittle of ATHENS had taken fea: one waye it was a pittle to beholde them. Another waye it made all fortes to wounder, that confidered the boldnes and corage of those men, which before sent awaye their fathers, and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at the teares, cries, therikes, & limbrafings of their wines, their children, & departures, but stowtly and resolutely helde on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding, there were many olde cittizens left still of necessitie in Athens, bicause they could not beremoued for very extreme age, which sturred many with compassion toward them. There was besides, a certen pittie that made mens harts to yerne, when they saw the poore doggs, beasts, & cattell ronne vp & downe bleating, mowing, and howling out alow deafter their mafters, in token of forowe, when they dyd imbarke. Amongest these, there goeth a straunge tale of Xan-B thippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for forowe his mafter had left him behinde him, dogge, dyd cast him self after into the sea, & swimming still by the galleys side wherein his master was, he helde on to the Ile of S ALAMINA, where so sone as the poore curre laded, his breath fayled him, & dyed presently. They saye, at this daye the place called the doggs graue, is the very place The dogge where he was buried. These were strauge acts of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS grave. for for the absence of Aristides, and fearing least of spyte he taking parte with the barbarous nation, might have bene the ruine & distruction of the state of GREECE, being banished five veres also before the warres, by Themistocles procurement: that he dyd set forth a decree; that Aristides reall those which had bene banished for a time, might returne home againe, to doe, to saye, & to maneth from geue counsell to the cittizens in those things, which they thought best for the preservation of by Themiston C GREECE. And also where Eurybiades, being generall of the GREECIANS whole army by fea, cle decree. for the worthines of the cittie of Sparta, but otherwise a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any case departe from thence, & retire into the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by lande affembled: that Themistocles withflood him; and did hinder it all he could. At that time also it was, that Themistocles made so notable aun- Notable aunfwers, which specially are noted, & gathered together. For when Eurybiades sayed one day vnto fwers of Thehim. Themistocles, those that at playes & games doe rise before the company, are whiftled at. It is true, said Themistocles: but those that tarie last so, doe never winne any game. Another time Eurybiades having a staffe in his hande lift it vp, as though he would have striken him. Strike & thou wilt, faid he, so thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wouldring to see him so paciet, suffered him D then to fave what he would. Then Themistocles beganne to bring him to reason: but one that stoode by fayed vnto him. Themistocles for a man that hath neither cittie nor house, it is an ill parte to will others that have, to for fake all. Themistocles turning to him, replied. We have willingly forfaken our houses and walles, sayed he, cowardly beaste that thou arte, bicause we would not become flaues for feare to lofe things, that have neither foule nor life. And yet our cittie I tell thee is the greatest of all GREECE: for it is a fleete of two hundred galleys readv to fight, which are come hither to faueyou if you lift. But if you will needes goe your wayes, & for fake vs the seconde time: you shall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANS haue another free cittie, & haue possessed againe as much good land, as that they haue already lost. These wordes made Eurybiades presently thincke, and seare, that the ATHENIANS would E not goe, and that they would for fake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reason against Themistocles opinion: he could not but aunswer him . Alas , and must his opinion, and prepared to fight by fea. But when the flete of their enemies shippes shewed on the coaftes of ATTICA, harde by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the rivers thereabouts, as farre as any bodie could fee, and that king Xerxes him felfe was come in persone with all his army by lande, to campe by the sea side: so that his whole power both by lande

you my masters talke of warres to, that are like to a Sleue? In deede you have a sworde, The slewe is but you lacke a harte. Some write, that whilest Themistocles was talking thus from his gal-affle faite-ley, they spyed an owle slying on the right hande of the shippes, which came to light on founded by a one of the master of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other Greecians dyd agree to

went about to talke of any other matter. To be shorte, it was concluded that they should a fayle awaye the next night following & the mafters of the shippes had order geuen them to make all things readie for them to departe. Themistocles perceyuing their determination, he was maruelous angry in his minde, that the GREECIANS would thus disperse them selues 2 fonder, repairing every man to his owne cittie, and leaving the advantage which the nature of the place, & the straight of the arme of the sea, where they laye in harber together, did offer them: and so he bethought him selfe howe this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practise of one Sicinus came into his minde, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken prisoner before firatageame, in the warres, loued Themistocles very well, and was schoolemaster to his children. This Sicinus he fecretly fent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertise him that Themistocles (generall he want sa of the ATHENIANS) was very desirous to become his maiesties seruaunte, and that he dyd B let him understand betimes, that the GREECIANS were determined to flye: and therefore that he wished him not to let them scape, but to set vpon them, whilest they were troubled and affrayed, and farre from their army by lande, to the ende that youn a sodaine he might ouerthrowe their whole power by sea, Xerxes supposing this intelligence came from a man that withed him well, received the messenger with great ioye, and thereupon gaue present order to his captaines by fea, that they should imbarke their men into the other shippes at better leyfure, and that prefently they should put out with all possible speede, two hundred fayle to followe the GREECIANS in the taile, to shut up the foreland of the straite, and to compasse the Iles all about, that not one of his enemies shippes should scape: and so it fell out. Then Aristides (Lysimachus sonne) being the first that perceyued it, went to Themistoeles tente, though he was his enemie, and through his only meanes had bene banished before, as ye have heard: and calling him out, told him how they were environned. Them: Stocles, who knewe well enough the goodnes of this man, being very glad he came at that time to feeke him out, declared vnto him the pollicie he had vied by the meffage of Sicinus, praying him to put to his helpe to staye the GREECIANS, and to procure with him, considering his & Mittides worde had more authoritie among them, that they would fight within the straight of SALA-MINA. Aristides commending his great wildome, went to deale with the captaines of the other gallyes, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credit that he fayed, untill fuch time as there arrived a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine, who being stolen out of the hoste of the barbarous army, brought certen newes, that D the straight out of doubt was shut up. So that besides the necessitie which dyd vrge them, the fpight which the GREECIANS conceyued thereof dyd prouoke them to hazard the battell. The next morning by breake of dave, king Xerxes placed him felfe on a maruelous steepe highe hill, from whence he might descerne his whole flete, and the ordering of his army by fea, about the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrowe waye or channell betweet the Ile of SALAMINA, and the coast of ATTICA: or as Acestodorus sayeth, vpon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the pointe which they commonly call the hornes. There Xerxes fet up a throne of golde, and had about him many fecretaries, to write all that was done in the battell . But as Themistocles was facrificing vnto the goddes in his galley that was admiral, they brought to him three young prifoners, fayer of complexion, E richely arrayed with gold and juells, whom they fayed were the children of Sandauce the kings fifter, and of prince Autarctus. So foone as Euphrantides the foothefayer had feene them, and at their arrivall observed there rose a great bright same out of the sacrifice, and at the very felfe fame instant that one on his right hand had sneesed: he tooke Themistocles by the hand, and willed him to facrifice all those three prisoners vnto the god Bacchus, surnamed Omestes, as much to faye, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GREECIANS should not only be faued, but they should have the victorie over their enemies. Themistocles woundred much, to heare so straunge and terrible a commaundement of the soothsayer. Neuertheles, the comon forte following his custome, which is to promise safety soner in the greatest daungers, & most desperate cases, by straunge & vnreasonable, rather then by reasonable and ordinary meanes: F they beganne to call upon the god with one voyce, and bringing the three priloners neere vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the facrifice in that forte as the foothefayer had appointed.

A appointed. Phanias Lesbian, an excellent philosopher, and well seene in stories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the shippes of the barbarous nauie: Æschylus the poet, in a tragedie which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainely the trothe, fayeth thus:

King Xerxes had a thousand shippes I knowve, amongest the wwhich two hundred wwere (I trouve) and feuen: wwhich all the rest dyd ouersayle with swifter course. This is withouten fayle.

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in enery one of the which there were eightene souldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no B leffe skill & wifedom choose his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntill the hower was come, that of ordinarie custome the sea winde arose, and brought in a rough ryde within the channell, which dyd not hurt the GRECIAN gallyes, being made lowe and fnugge, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallyes, being highe cargged, heavie, & not yare of steredge, and made them lye sidelong to the GREECIANS, who siercely set vpon them having allwaves an eye to Themistocles direction, that best foresawe their aduatage. At the same time, Ariamenes, Xerxes admirall, a man of great valure and worthiest of the Kings brethern, be Ariamenes flowed arrowes and dartes as it were from the walles of a castell, charging the gallye of Aminias Decelian, and Solicles Pedian, which were ioyned and grappled with him, and fiercely entring the fame, was by them valliantly receiued vpon their pikes, and thrust ouer borde into C the fea. Whose bodie floting amongest other shippewracks ARTEMISIA knowing, caused to be carried to king Xerxes. Nowe whilest this battell stoode in these termes, they saye that there appeared a great flame in the element, toward the cittie of ELEVSIN, and that a lowde vovce was heard through all the plaine of Thriasiavnto the fea, as if there had bene a nuber of men together, that had fonge out alowde, the holy fonge of Iacchus. And it feemed by litle and litle, that there rose a clowde in the ayer from those which sange: that left the land, & came & lighted on the gallyes in the sea. Other affirmed, that they sawe armed men, which did reache out their hands from the Ile of ÆGINA, towards the GREBCIAN gallyes: & they thought they were the ÆACIDES, for whose helpe they all prayed before the battell was begonne. The first man of the ATHENIANS that tooke any of the enemies (hippes, was Lycomedes, a captaine of a D gallye: who hauing take very rich furniture & flagges, did afterwards cofecrate them to Apollo laurellias ye would faye victorious. The other GREBCIANS in the fronte being equall in nu-ber with the barbarous shipps, by reason of the straightnes of the arme of the sea wherein they fought, & fo straightned as they could not fight but by one & one, where by the BARBARIANS disorderly layed one another abourde, that they did hinder them selues with their ouer multitude: & in the end were so fore pressed upon by the Grebectans, that they were costrayned to

Thus was the victorie wonne through the valliantnes and corage of those that fought that battell, but especially through Themistocles great policie and wisdome. After this battell Xerxes being mad for his losse, thought to fill vp the arme of the sea, and to passe his armie by lande, vpon a bridge, into the Ile of SALAMINA. Themistocles, bicause he would feele Aristides opinion, tolde him as they were talking together, that he thought best to goe and occupie the straight of Hellespont with the armie by sea, to breake the bridge of Thippes which Xerxes had caused to be made: to the ende, said he, that we maye take Asia into Evrope. Arifides liked not this opinion . for we have (faid he) fought all this while against this barbarous F King, who thought but to playe with vs: But if we shut him within GREECE, and bring him to fight of necessitie to faue his life: such an enemie that commaundeth so great an armie, will no more stand still as a looker on, and set at his ease under his golden paullion, to see the pastime of the battell, but will proue euerie waye, and be him felfe in euery place at all affayes to take him self from such a straight & daunger. Thus with politicke care & foresight, he maye easely amend his former faulte committed by negligence, and doe well enough, when he thall fee Ariffides his life and Kingdome both depend upon it. Therefore Themistocles, I would thinke not best to breake his bridge at all, which he hath caused to be made: but rather if we could, to build for the brea another to it, to drive him out of Evrore as fone as we could. Themistocles then replied: hing of xer- Seeing you thincke this were good to be done, we must all laye our heades together, to deuise how he mave be forced to come out affone as we could. They breaking of with this resolution Themistocles sent immediately one of the Kings enuches, called Arfaces, that was one of the gromes of his chaber, whom he found out amogest the prisoners, & by him he sent this mesfage vnto the King. That the GREECIANS having wone the battell of him by fea, had decreed B in their counsell, how they would goe to the straight of HELLESPONT, to breake the bridge of shippes he had caused to be made there. Whereof he thought good to advertise him, for the goodwil he did beare him, and to the ende he might bethincke him betimes, to get him away to the sea within his own dominion, and so passe backe againe into Asia as sone as he could whilest he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to staye following him at the poope. The barbarous King vnderstading these newes, was so affrayed, that he hoysed away with all noth, ble speede. The further foresight and great wisdome of Themistocles, and Aristides, in marine causes, dyd manifestly appeare afterwards in the battell the GREECIANS fought before the cittle of PLATEA, against Mardonius, king Xerxes lieutenante: who having but a small power of the King his soueraines there, dyd yet put the GREECIANS to great distresse, and in hazard C to haue loft all. Of all the townes and citties that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the cittie of Æ GINA wanne the fame for valliantnes about the rest: & of private men, among the GRECIANS, Themistocles was judged the worthiest man: although it was fore against their willes, bicause they enuied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and having sworne vpon the altar of their factifices, that they would geue their voyces after their consciences, to those they thought had sembly of the playes Olympicall that were made after this victorie: when Themistocles was once come into the showe place where these games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all cast their eyes on him, shewing him to the straungers which they esteemed him. Whereat he him selfe tooke so great delite, that he confessed to his fami-

best deserved it: every one gave him selfe the first place for worthines, and the seconde vnto Themistocles Themistocles . The LACED & MONIANS caried him into Sparta, where they judged the honour and dignitie to their admirall Eurybiades: but the wisedome and pollicie they attributed to Themistocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue braunche, and the goodliest coche 0 Grecians. that was in their cittie: and moreouer they fent three hundred of their lufty youthes to accompany him, and conducte him out of their countrie. They fave, at the next feaftes and af-knewe him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their handes dyd witneffe howe much

liar friends, he then dyd reape the fruite and benefit of his fundry and painefull services he had taken in hande, for the preservation of GREECE: so ambitious was he of nature, & couetous ambition no. of honour, as we maye easely perceyue by certen of his dedes and notable sayings they have E noted of him. For being choien admirall of ATHENS he neuer dispatched any causes private or publicke, howfoeuer they fell out, vntill the very daye of his departure, and taking thippe: and all bicause that men seeing him ryd much busines at once, and to speake with so many persones together, they should esteeme him to be the notabler man, & of the greater authoritie. Another time he walked upon the fandes by the fea fide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the fea had cast vp vpon the shore: and seing some of them that had on still their chaynes of golde, and bracelets, he passed by on his waye, but shewed them yet to his familiar friende that followed him, and fayed vnto him: take thou those, for thou art not Themistocles. And vnto one Antiphates, who in his youth had bene a goodly young boye. and at that time dyd fcornefully behaue him selfe vnto him, making no reckoning of him: and F now that he sawe him in authoritie came to see him, he sayed. O my young sonne, and friend: we are both even at one time(but to late) growen wife . He fayed the ATHENIANS dyd not esteeme of him in time of peace : but when any storme of warres were towardes, and they floode in any daunger, they ranne to him then, as they ronne to the shadowe of a plane tree, vpon any fodaine raine: and after fayer weather come againe, they cut awaye then the braunches, and bowghes thereof. There was a man borne in the Ile of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, dyd cast him in the teethe, that it was not for his worthines, but for the noble cittie wherein he was borne, that he had wonne fuch glorie. Thou fayest true faved he: but neither should I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a S BRI-PHIAN, nor thou also if thou haddest bene an ATHENIAN. An other time one of the captaines of the cittie, having done good service vnto the common weale, made boalt before Themistocles, and compared his service equall with his . Themistocles to aunswer him, A prey rate B tolde him a prety tale. That the working daye brawled on a time with the holy daye, repining of The wiffagainst her, that he laboured for his living continually, and howe she dyd nothing but fill her bellie, and spende that they had gotten. Thou hast reason sayed the holy daye. But if I had not benebefore thee, thou haddest not bene here nowe. And so, if I had not bene then: where had you my masters bene nowe? His owne sonne was a litle to sawsie with his mother, and with him also, bearing him felf ouer boldely of her good will, by meanes of her cockering of him. Whereupo being merely disposed, he would saye that his sonne could doe more then any ma in all GRECE. For, fayeth he, the ATHENIANS commaunde the GRECIANS, I commaunde Themistocles the ATHENIANS, my wife commaundeth me, and my sonne commaundeth her. Moreouer faing of his bicause he would be singular by him selse aboue all other men having a pece of lande he fame. C would fell, he willed the crier to proclaime open fale of it in the market place, and with all he should adde vnto the sale, that his lande laye by a good neighbour, Another time, two men being suters to his daughter, he preferred the honester before the richer, saying : he had rather haue to his sonne in lawe a man that lacked goodes, then goodes to lacke a man. These were Themistocles pleasaunt conceites and aunswers . But after he had done all these things we have spoken of before, he tooke in hande to buylde againe the cittie and walles of ATHENS, and dyd corrupt the officers of LACED & MONIA with money, to the end. Themittedes they should not hinder his purpose, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other saye when he buyt against had deceyued them by this subtilitie, he went vnto SPARTA as ambassadour, sent thither of the raile of purpose vpon the complaintes of the LACED EMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS, Athens, D dyd inclose their cittie againe with walles, who were accused vnto the counsaill of Sparta, by an orator called Poliarchus, who was fent thither from the ÆGINETES, of purpose to prosecute this matter against the ATHENIANS. Themistocles stowtely denied it to them, and prayed them for better vnderstanding of the trothe, they would fende some of their men thither to fee it. This was but a fetche only to winne by this delaye, the ATHENIANS A fubile fo muche more time to rayse vp their walles, and that the ATHENIANS should keepe fetche of as oftages for fuertie of his persone, those they should send to ATHENS, to bring backe the reporte thereof: and so it fell out. For the LACEDEMONIAN s being informed of the trothe as it was, dyd him no hurte, but diffembling the misliking they had to be thus abufed by him, fent him awaye fafe and founde. Afterwardes he made them also mende and for-E tifie the hauen of PIREA, hauing confidered the fituation of the place, and all to incline The hauen of the cittie to the sea. Wherein he dyd directly contrary to all the counsell of the auncient Pressont kings of A THENS: who feeking (as they faye) to withdrawe their people from the fea, and fed. to accustomethem to live vpon the lande, by planting, sowing, and plowing their groundes, dyd deuise and geue out abroade, the fable they tell of the goddesse Pallas. And that is this, how the contending with Neptune about the patronage of the country of ATHENS, brought forth and shewed to the judges the olyue tree, by meanes whereof the preuayled, and obteined the preheminence. Euen so Themistocles dyd not joyne the hauen of PIREA, vnto the cittle of ATHENS, as the comicall poet Aristophanes fayeth: but rather loyned the cittle vnto the hauen PIREA, and the lande vnto the sea. By this meanes he made the people

F strong against the nobilitie, and brought the communaltie to waxe bolder then they were before, by reason the rule and authoritie fell into the handes of saylers, mariners, pilottes, shippemasters, and such kinde of seafaring men: so as the pulpet where all the oracles were made, stoode in the market place of PNYx, and dyd looke towardes the sea. But the thirtie A tyrannes that came in afterwardes, dyd remoue it, and turne it towardes the lande: holding opinion to be strong by fea, was it that dyd mainteine the authoritie of the popular state. And that contrariwise they which line by the labour and toyle of the earthe, doe more willingly like the gouernment of Nobilitie. Themistocles called to minde another matter also of greater importance, to make the cittle of ATHENS of a greater power by ica. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the fleete and nauie of the GR ECIANS wintered in the hauen of P A G A S E s: he fayed one daye in an open affembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them.

but it was not to be tolde openly. The people willed him then to imparte it to Aristides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it speedely. Themistocles then tolde Ari- B flides: the thing he had confidered of, was to burne the Arcenal where the GRECIANS nauy laye, and to fet on fire all their shippes. Aristides hearing his purpose, returned to the people, and tolde them: howe nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniust, then that which Themistocles had deuised. The ATHENIANS then willed Aristides it should be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACED & MONIANS had exhibited their petition to the counsell of the Amphictyons (that is the generall counsaill of all the parties with the GRECIANS to the league, against the barbarous people, should be put of

wholy from this counfaill. Themistocles dowting of the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS, and the THEBANS also should by this meanes be exempted, that the LACED EMONIANS C would be then the greater number in voyces, and by this meanes might doe what they would in this counsell: he spake so consideratly for the citties which they would have thus discharged, that he made the petitioners in the assembly vtterly to chaunge their opinion. Declaring, howe there were but one and thirtie citties comprised only the league, and yet that some of them were very weake and small: and howe it were no reason, that rejecting all the rest of GRECE, the greatest authoritie of this counsaill should fall into the handes of two or three of the chiefest citties alone. For this cause chiefly the LACED EMONIANS dyd euer beare him extreme hatred, and dyd fet vp Cimon all they could, to be allwayes aduerfary opposite vnto him, and as it were to bearde him in all matters of state, and the go-uernment of ATHENS. They procured him besides, the ill will and displeasure of all the D friendes and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went fayling still to and fro alongest the Iles, exacting money of the inhabitants of the same. And this is to be knowen by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would have had money) and by the aunswer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, howehe had Themistocles brought them two mightie goddes: Loue, and Force. And they aunswered him againe, that they also had two great goddesses, which kept them from gening of him any money: Pouertie, and Impossibilitie. And to make this good also: Timoereon the Rhodian poet galled him to The Andrias the quicke, when he tharpely taunted him, for calling many home agains for money that were banished: and howe for couetousnes of money he had betrayed, and forfaken, his hoste and friende. The verses wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effecte. Who list commend wworthy Paufanias, Xanthippus or good Leotychides, yet shall I seeme but light thereof to passe, compared with valliant Aristides. For yet was naye the like in Athens towne. nor neuer shall come none of like renouve. Themistocles by right and due deserte, is hated of Latona, for his lyes, and for he bare a traitrous vvicked harte, vuho like a vuretche & nigard did denife. for small revvardes his host Timocreon so holde out of his countrie Ialison.

Or putting them to death without cause tolde. he date thereby great heapes of come and golde. But in the ende (ô right rewvarde for (uch) this bribing vuretch, was forced for to holde, a tipling bounthe most like a clouvne or famohe, at holy feastes and pastimes manifold, wwhich wwere amongest the people in those dayes Istmiciane folke, dyd vse the like alluvayes. with the Barbarous people, and for gening them intelligence. Whereof Themistocles was one that judicially condemned him . Wherefore when Themistocles him selfe was accused afterwards of the same faulte, Timocreon then made these verses following against him. Timocreon was not without his pheere, which did conferre with Medes prinely, Since others mo the felfe same blame might beare, mo foxes lurke in dennes as vvell as 1. Belides these verses, Themistocles owne cittizens for the ill will they bare him, were contented to heare him ill spoken of. Therefore while he sought wayes, to redresse all this: he was driuen to yse such meane, which more increased their hatred toward him . For in his orations to the people, he dyd ofte remember them of the good feruice he had done them and perceyuing howe they were offended withall, he was driven to faye. Why, are ye weary to ofte to receyue good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him also, when he furnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Aristobule, as much to fave, as the good counfeller: meaning thereby, howe he had geuen graue and wife counfell, both vitto E his cittie, and to all the rest of the GRECIANS. He built this temple also neere his house, in a place called Melita, where the hangemen doe cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throwe the ragges and halters endes of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by lawe. There was also in our dayes in the temple of Diana Aristobule, a litle image of Themistocles, which shewed plainely, that he was not only wife, and of a noble minde, but also of a great maiestie and countenaunce in face. In the ende, the ATHENIANS banished him A-THEN'S for five yeres, bicause they would plucke downe his overgreat corage and authoritie, Themistackes as they dyd vie to ferue those, whose greatnes they thought to be more, then common equa- banished for litie that ought to be among cittizens would beare. For this manner of banishment for a time, fine year. called Ostracifmon, was no punishment for any faulte committed, but a mitigation and taking

F away of the enuie of the people, which delited to plucke downe their stomaks that to much feemed to exceede ingreatnes: and by this meanes they tooke awaye the poyfon of his malice, with diminishing his glorie and honour . So Themistocles being banished ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane season, Paulanias treechery fell out, which gaue his enemies occasion to lye heavie on his backe. But he which became his accuser, & was partener of the treason, was one called Leobotes (Alemeons sonne) borne in a village called AGRAVLA. Besides this, the Spartans also dyd fit on his skirtes, & charged him forely. For Paulanias never before reuealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although he was his very familliar friende. But after he sawe Themistocles was banished, and dyd take his exile very unpaciently:

then Paulanias was bolde to open his treason to him, to procure him to take his parte, and shewed him the letters the king of Persia had written to him, and all to sturre him yo against him of, and tolde him plainely he would be no partener of his treason. Notwithstanding, he neuer reuealed it to any living creature, nor discovered the practife he intended: hoping ei- B ther he would have geven it over, or that thortely it would appeare by fome other meane. considering he so fondly aspired to things of great daunger, and without purpose or possibilite. After Paulanias was condemned, and had suffered paynes of death for the same : they found amongest his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themistocles to be very fore suspected. Whereupon the LACED & MONTANS on the one side cried out of him: and his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accused him on th'other side. To the which he made aunfwer by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people, it was not likely that he (who fought all the wayes to rule, and was not borne to ferue, neither had any minde thereto) would euer haue thought in his heade, to fell his owne libertie, and the GRECIANS also vnto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithstanding this purgation of his, the people by the C procurement of his enemies, sent to apprehende him, and to bring him before the states of all GRECE, to be judged by that counfaill, Whereof Themistocles having intelligence in time, he Themistocles dyd conucy him selfe into the Ile of Corphy, bicause the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certen pleasure in time paste he had done them. For they being at sute and strife with the CORTNEHIANS, he tooke up the matter betweene them, and gaue judgement on their fide, & condemned the CORINTHIANS to paye them twety talents damages: and did fet downe an order, that they should occupie the He of Levende in comon together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, aswell of the one cittie, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whether being followed by the ATHENIANS, & the LACEDEMONIANS, he was compelled to venter him felfe vpon a doubtfull and very daungerous hope. For he went D to yelde him selfe into the hands of Admetus, king of the Molossians. Who having heretofore made certen requeltes vnto the ATHENIANS, and being shamefully denied them by meanes of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefest height and authoritie) the King was maruelously offended with him: and it was a clere case in deede, that if he could then have layed handes on him, he would have bene reuenged of him throughly. How beit feeling the prefent milerie of of his exile, he thought he might lesse search Kings olde quarrell and displeasure. then the freshe hate & enuie of his contriemen. Whereupon he went vnto king Admetus, trusting to his mercie, and became an humble futer to him in a straunge extraordinarie forte. For he tooke the Kings litle young fonne in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappell: which humble manner of suinge the Molossians take to be most effe- E ctuall, and fuch as they dare not denie, nor refuse. Some saye that Queene Phthia her selfe, the Kings wife, dydenforme him of this their country cultome and manner, & brought her litle sonne also neere vnto the altar. Other write also, that it was Admetus him selfe that taught & shewed him this inforcing manner of petition, only for a cloke to excuse him felse to those that should come to demaunde Themistocles of him: that by duetie of religion he was so straightly bounde & restrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protection. In this meane time, Epicrates Acharnian founde the meanes secretly to conuey Themistocles wife and children out of ATHENS, & dyd fend them privelie vnto him: whereupon he was afterwards accused, & put to death, vpon Cimons accusation & motion, as Stefimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring those matters I knowe not howe, or making as though Themistocles had not re- F membred him selfe, doth saye, that Themistocles sayled into Sicile, where he sought to mary Hierons daughter, the tyranne of Syracvsa: promising him if he would let him have her, he

At wanted affire him to conquer all GRECE for him, and to bring them under his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into Asia: but that is not likely, For Theophralius writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron having fent certain running hories to the feast of games Olympicall, & having set vp a maruelous riche and sumprious tent there: Themistocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they should teare the tyrannes tente in peces, and not to suffer his horses to ronne with other freifte and light horfes, and to cary away the price in those holy games. Thueydides againe declareth howe he went vnto the other fea, and imbarked in the cittle of PyDNE being knowen of neuer a man in the shippe, vntill such time as the winde beganne to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which the ATHENIANS by chaunce dyd besiege at that time, where being afeard to be fet on lande, he was forced to bewraye him felf to the master of the shippe, & the masters mate, and wrought them, what with fayer wordes and what with threates (by faying he would accuse them to the ATHENIANS, that they dyd not ignorantly receive him in, but hiered for money) so as he compelled them to fayle on further, and to cary him into Asia. As for his goodes, his friendes faued the most parte of them, and sent them into A siA to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate vnto the state: Theopompus writeth, they dyd amounte to the value of one hundred talents . And Theophrastus fayeth, but to foure score talents only. So that all his goodes was not worth three talents, when he beganne to gouerne the state of the common weale, when he came vnto the cittle of C v MA, he perceyued that all the coastes by sea were layed for him to apprehende him, and that he had many spyalls C vpon him: among the which, these were two special noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that fought their gayne any waye they could. For the king of PERSIA had proclaymed by found of trupet, two hundred talets to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of AoLIA, called AGEs, where no liuing bodie knewe him, but his host only, called Nicogenes: who was the richest man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knewe all the noble men of authoritie that were about the king of PERSIA. Themistocles continued hidden certen dayes in his house : in which time, on a night after the feast of a facrifice, one Olbius, schoolemaster to Nicogenes children, by some secret working of

Thenext night following, Themistocles being fast asleepe in his bed, dreamed that a snake Themistocles wounde it selfe round about his bellie, and glided vpwardes to his necke, vntill it touched dreame, his face, and fodginely then it became an eagle, and imbraced him with his winges: and fo at length dyd lifte him vp into the ayer, and caried him a maruelous waye of, vntill he thought he fawe a golden rodde (fuche as Herauldes vse to carie in their handes) whereupon the eagle dyd let him, and so was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought him selfe in. The trothe was, Nicogenes had this deuise in his heade, howe he might bring him fafe to E the king of PERSIAES courte. The Barbarous nations for the most parte (and specially the PERSIANS) are of a very straunge nature, and maruelous lealous ouer their women, and The Persians that not onely of their wives, but also of their bonde women, and concubines: which they it their wives. keepe fo straightly locked up, that no man euer seeth them abroade at any time, but are allwayes like housedones kept within doores. And when they have any occasion to goe into the country, they are caried in close coches couered all about that no man can looke into them. Themistocles was conveyed into one of these coches drest after this manner, and had warned Home Themihis men to aunswer those they met by the waye, that asked whom they caried: howe it was a focies was young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the countrie of Ion 1 A, which they carried to the courte for the king of a noble man there. Thueydides, and Charon Lampfacenian fave, he went thither after the Persta

F death of Xerxes, and spake with his sonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with him selfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides wordes doe best agree with the chronicles & tables, recording the succession of times, Moreoner, Roxanes, one of the captaines, as Thereillo eles passed by him going to the King (who was set in his chayer of state, and enery man, keeping) filence) fortely fighing, fayed vinto him. at that time, the noble men imagined he had bene to bolde to comon with the King of them,

C in which time having pretily learned the Perlian tongue, he afterwards spake to the King him.

The Perfuns honour their and manners of their owne countrie. For you GRECIANS have the name to love libertie, and equalitie aboue all things: & for vs. amongest all the goodly lawes and customes we have we effeeme this about the rest: to reverence and honour our King, as the image of the god of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt facion ? king at the thy selfe after our manner to honour the King, thou mayest both see him, and speake with image of the self in the should be self the self that t

My lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the defire I have to advaunce his glorie and power, is the only cause of my present repaire vnto his courte : therefore I meane not only to obey your lawes (fince it hath fo pleased the goddes to rayle up the noble empire of PERSIA vnto this greatnes) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there doe at this present. Therefore let there be no staye, but that my felfe in persone maye deliuer to the King that I have to saye ynto C him. Well, fayed Artabanus: whom then shall we faye thou arte? For by thy speache it feemeth, thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles aunswered him: as for that Artabanus, none shall knowe before the King him selfe. Thus doth Phanias reporte it. But Eratosthenes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: howe Themistocles had accesse vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERETRIA Themistocles whom the King kept . Themistocles being brought to his presence, after he had presented his talk with the humble duety and reuerence to him, stoode on his feete, and sayed neuera worde, vntill the sayed. King commassed the interpreter to aske him what he was and he aunswered. May e it please. King commanded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he aunswered. Maye it please your maiestie, ô noble King: I am Themistocles the Athenian, a banished man out of my country by the Grecians, who humbly repayreth to your highnes, knowing I have done great D hurt to the PERSIANS, but I persuade myself I have done them farre more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS backe they dyd not follow you, whe the state of GRECE was deliuered from thraldome, and my natiue country from daunger, and that I knew I stoode then in good state to pleasure you. Nowe for me, I finde all mens good willes agreable, to my present misery and calamitie: for I come determined, most humbly to thanke your highnes, for any grace and fauour you shall shewe me, & also to craue humble pardone, if your majesty be yet offended with me. And therfore licence me (most noble King) to beseche you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witnesses of the pleasures I have done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace vse my harde fortune, as a good occasion to shewe your honorable vertue, rather then to fatisfie the paffion of your heate and choller. For in fauing E my life, your maiestie saueth an humble suter that put him selfeto your mercie: and in putting me to death, you shall ryd away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Hauing spoken thus these words, he fayed further. That the goddes, by divers fignes and tokens had procured him, to come to fubmit him selfe vnto him, and tolde the King what vision he had seene in his dreame in Nicogenes house: and declared also the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commaunded him that he should goe vnto him that was called as a god, and howe he thought it was the perfone of his maiestie, bicause that god and he in trothe were called both great Kings. The King having thus heard him speake, gave him then no present aunswer againe, notwithstanding he maruelously wondred at his great wisedome and boldenes. But afterwardes amongest his familliars the King fayed, he thought him felfe very happy to mete with the good fortune of F Themistocles comming to him: and so befought his great god Arimanius, that he would allwayes fend his enemies fuch mindes, as to banishe the greatest, & wifest men amongest them.

alfo. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, & afterwardes murmured much against him, For in deede the king dyd honour Themistoeles aboue all other straugers whatsoeuer they were, On a time the king had him out a hunting with him, he made him fee his mother, with whom he Themistocke a time the king had him out a nunting with min, it made him tell is made the disputations of honoured of grewe familliar; and by the kings owne commandement he was to heare the disputations of the king of the wife men of PERSIA touching fecret philosophie, which they call magike. But the king gaue him fo sharpe a repulse for his vnreasonable request, & was so angrie with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgeuen him: howbeit Themistocles was so earnest a suter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the reporte goeth, that the kings successours which haue bene since that time, winder whom the Persians haue had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great E state or personage of GRECE into their service, they wrote vnto him, and promised him they would make him greater about them, then cuer was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirme it. For he being stept vp to great countenaunce and authoritie, & followed with great traines of futers after him by reason of his greatnes: seing him self one daye very honorably ferued at his table, & with all fortes of daintie meates, he turned him to his childre, & fayed vnto them. My fonnes, we should have benevndone, if we had not bene vindone. The most writers doe agree, that he had given him the revenue of 3. citties for his al- Themisticales lowance of bread, wine & vittailes: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, & MYVNTA. But Neather had the rene-10wance of Dread, wine & Vittalies to Wit, Wind NESTA, LAMPS ACT 3, & PALES CEPSTA: the one to cities more, PERCOTA, & Phanias, doe adde two other citties more, PERCOTA, & Phanias, doe adde two other citties more, PERCOTA, & Phanias, doe adde two other citties more, PERCOTA, & Phanias, doe adde two other citties more, PERCOTA, & Phanias, doe adde two other citties more, PERCOTA, & PALES CEPSTA: the one to defraye his charges of apparell, & the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themistocles going into him for his 140 should come into a towne of his gouernment, called the Lyons head. But as he slept on a daye A Themistocles in his house in the after none, the mother of the goddes appeared vnto him, and layed, The-

a fraged man mistocles, goe not to the Lyons heade, for feare thou mete with the Lyon and for this warning, I doe aske thy daughter Anesiptolema for my servante. Themistocles waking sodainely out of his dreams made his most sold for this warout of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddeffe, and turning out of the highe waye, fetched another compasse about. Afterwardes hauing passed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beaftes which carried his tente, fell by the waye, vnfortunatly in a river, and all his arras and tapestry hangings being throughly wet, his servaunts were driven to laye them out a drying by moone light. The Pssidians that laye in wayte, and could not discerne by moone light that they were hangings layed out to dive, thought it had bene the very tente Themistocles felfe dyd lye in : whereupon they went vnto it with their fwordes A drawen in their handes, hoping to haue taken him fleeping. But when they were come thither, and beganne to lifte vp a pece of the hangings: some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watche) perceyuing them, ranne vpon them, and tooke them. So Themistocles having escaped this daunger, wondred greately at the sauour of the goddesse which had appeared vnto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the cittie of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mnesiptolema prioresse of the same, As he passed by the cittle of SARD IS for his recreation, he went to visite the temples, and offerings that had bene geuen there. So he fawe an image of a mayden in copper, in the temple of the mother of the goddes, being two yeardes highe, which they called the Hydrophora: as much to saye, as the water carier. And it was a statue, which him selfe had heretofore dedica- C ted, and caused to be made, with the fines of those that had payed for feytures, for stealing or turning awaye the water course at ATHENS, at such time as he was master surveyer of the water workes and conduites there. Wherfore, whether Themistocles was fory to fee this goodly image a prisoner in the handes of the Barbarous people, or that he would showe vnto the ATHENIANS the greatnes of his credit and authoritie through all the Kings dominions; he spake to the gouernour of Lydia, & prayed him for his sake that he would fend this image againe to ATHENS. But this Barbarous gouernour was very angry with his request, and tolde him he would aduertise the King thereof. Then Themistocles beganne to be afeard, & was driuen to feeke to the gouernours women and concubines, whom he got for money to intreate him, and so made fayre weather againe with the gouernour. But from thenceforth, he tooke D better garde of him felfe in all his doings, greatly fearing the enuy of the Barbarous people. For he progressed not up and downe A s I A, as Theopompus writeth, but lave a long time in the cittle of MAGNESIA, quietly enjoying the Kings gratious giftes bestowed on him: where he was honoured & reuerenced for one of the greatest persones of PERSIA, whilest the King was els where occupied in the affayres of the highe prouinces of Asia, and had no leyfure to

to leavy men, to affemble captaines, & to dispatche postes vnto Themistocles at MAGNESIA. with the Kings letters, straightly charging him to haue an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreouer that he should faithfully keepe his promise he had made to him. But he, to shewe that he neither maliced his cittizens, nor was moued with the defire of greatnes and authoritie he might haue growen vnto in those warres, or els for that he thought the Kings expectation would proue to a greater matter, then he could ende or wade through, confidering GRECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongest the rest had maruelous good fortune, and that it should be a reproche to him to stayne the glorie of fo many noble actes, fo many triumphes, and fo great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wife resolution with him selfe, to make suche an ende of his life, as the F fame thereof deserved. For he made a solemne sacrifice vnto the goddes, and feasted at the fame all his friends. And, after he had taken his leaue of them all, he drancke bulles bloude, thincke vpon those of GRECE. But when newes was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour & affiftance of the ATHENIANS, & that the GRECIANS gallyes dyd scowre the seas even vnto the Ile of Cyprvs, & vnto the coastes of Cilicia, & that Cimon had all the fea in subjection: that made him then to bende all his thoughts howe to resist the GRECIANS, that their greatnes might not turne to his hurte. Then commissions went out E as most men thincke (or as other saye) poy for i, which dispatches a man in source and twenty howers, and so ended his dayes in the cittle of Magnes 1 %, after he had lived threescore and fine yeres, and the most parte of them allwayes in office, and great charge. It is written, that the king of PERSIA vnderstanding the cause and manner of his deathe, dyd more esteeme him afterwards, then he dyd before, and that euer after he continued to vie his friends and familliars in very good forte. THE LIFE OF Furius Camillus.

MONGEST many great matters which are spoken of this Fr. A rius Camillus, this seemeth most straunge and wonderfull aboue the rest. That he having borne the chiefest offices of charge in his couna trie and having done many notable and worthy deedes in the fame:as one that was chosen fine times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had wonne him felfe the name & title of the feconde founder of Rome, and yet neuer came to be Conful. But the only cause thereof was, that the common weale of Rome stoode then in such flate and forte. The people were then at differition with the Senate.

They would chuse no more Consuls, but other kynde of gouernours whom they called Tribuni militares: these dyd all things with like power & authoritie as the Consuls, yet were they B nothing so odious vnto the people, by reason of the number that was of them. For it was some hope to them that could ill beare the rule of the small number of nobilitie, that the gouernment of the state being put into fixe, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eafier, and tollerabler. Nowe Camillus being at that time in his best credit and authoritie, and in the prime and glorie of his doings, dyd not defire to be made Conful without the goodwill of the people, although whilest he was in authoritie, there were many times Confuls created. But to all other offices and dignities, he was called, and chosen. He behaued him felfe in such forte, that when he was alone, he made his authoritie comon to other: and when he had companions & affociates, the glorie of all redounded to him felf alone. The cause whereof, was his modestie on the one side, for he commaunded euer without enuie: and his great C wifedome and wifedome and fufficiencie on the other fide, for the which all others willingly gaue him place, and yelded to him. The house of the Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the first that beganne to set him self forwards. For in a great battell which was fought against the Æques and Volsces, he being but a private man at armes vnder the Dictator Posthumius Tubertus, was the first that riding out of the army, aduaunced him selfe, and gaue the charge. And being ronne into the thighe at that time with a staffe broken vpon his thighe, he plucked the trunchen out, and retired not for all that: but geuing chardge againe vpon the stowtest of the enemies, he fought it out so valliantly to the encoraging of other, that he was the chief cause they turned their backes. Whereupon, to requite his feruice done at that time (befides other lus neuer Conful. edious to the

CAMILLVS. A honours they dyd him) they made him Cenfor an office at that time of great preheminence & dignitie. In his office of Cenforthippe, he dyd two notable acts. The one very honest: when Camillus acts he brought men that were not maried, to marie the women whom the warres had left widows, his cenforwhich were in nuber many. To this he got them partly by perfuafion, & partly by threatnings, to fet roud fines vpo their heads that refused. The other very necessary in that he brought the orphanes to be cotributories, vnto taxes, & fublidies, which before payed nothing. The cause thereof was, the continuall warres, about the which the common weale susteined great charges: but specially about the siege of the citie of the VEIANS (which some call VENETIANIANS!) The sinie of that was a very foreburden to the at that time. For it was the capitall cittle of all THYSCAN, the Veies befiewhich for store of armour, & nuber of souldiers, was nothing inferiour vnto the cittle of Rome, ged. B For the VEIANS being growe to stomake & corage in time, by reason of their wealth & profperitie, & for the fundry great battells they had fought against the ROMAINES, that conteded with them for glory and empire: now it fell so out, that they finding them selues weakened by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receyued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacokes brauery, & ambition, to byd them battell any more in the fielde. Howbeit the inhabitants of the cittle of V BIBS having raifed the walles, & made very great high rapers.beganne to fortifie them felues, & made good prouision for armour & munition, besides store of corne, shotte, & other necessary things: they valliantly, & without feare of any thing, defended the fiege of the ROMAINES, that cotinued long time, & was no leffe hard & painefull vnto the that did besiege, then it was vnto those that were besieged. For where the ROMAINE SWETE WOT before time to keepe their houses in the winter season, and the field only in the sommer times that was the first time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to buylde fortes, and to intrenche their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies countrie, and to winter abroade as they were wont to lye in the campe in sommer. The chaunce that happened at the lake of ALBANVS, about the time the THVSCAN The wonderwarres were greatest, dyd maruelously amate the Romaines, being no lesse wounderfull, then full outsides. the most straunge and vncrediblest thing that could be tolde by man. For they could not finde, lake Albanus, out the cause of it by common reason, nor any naturall grounde: considering it was in the later end of Autumne, and sommer was ended, and that there had not bene much rayne, nor notable fowthewinds. And although there are many lakes, many brooks & riuers, many fprings, and other waters in I TALIE: yet some of them dried up altogether, other ranne but faintely by reason of the drought, and all the rivers then were (as they are wont to be commonly in fommer) very lowe, and there was scante any water. But the lake ALBANV s contrariwise, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whether out of him felfe, being enuironned all about with hilles and mountaines, and where the earthe is good: beganne to swell, and rife to every mans fight, without any cause at all (but secret and hidden vinto the goddes alone) and went allwayes increasing alongest those hilles sides, vntill suche time as it came to be even with the height of the highest mountaine, gathering vowardes still without any waves or tempest of weather at all. This at the first, made poore shepeheardes and heardemen, keeping their eattell thereaboutes, maruelously affrayed. But at the lengthe when the earthe and weight of one of the hilles (which kepte in the lake as a walle, F from running ouer into the felde) beganne to breake by reason of the waight, and great quantitie of water, that ranne straight with a maruelous extreme force and violence ouer all the arrable landes and groundes planted with trees, and so tooke his course into the

one instante, to bring out all the inhabitants of the cittie to man the walles. Whilest they were

And there was no other newes currante in the campe, which lave at fiege of the citie of V B I E s:infomuch as the very brute of it flewe ouer the walles of the cittie, vnto them that were befieged. And as it happeneth very ofte in long fieges, that those which lye in campe doe oftentimes talke with them that are befieged: there was a Romaine who fell acquainted and commonly vsed to talke familiarly with one of the cittie, who could tell of many olde & straunge things done and happened, and was very skillfull about any other in the cittie, in the arte of diuination or footheraying. The Romaine then tolde him one daye the violent brea-caried him awaye with him, and with helpe of other fouldiers which came ronning out of the vsed, and knowing also that fatall desteny cannot be anoyded, beganne to declare vnto the Ro-MAINES, the auncient oracles and prophecies touching the fortune of their cittie: by which it was reported vnto them, that the cittie of VEIES should neuer be taken, vntill the enemie had caused the water of the lake ALBANYS (which should breake out) to be brought backe campe vnto him, he brought him to the captaines. The V BIAN feeing him felf thus forciblie king out of the lake ALBANYS, and perceyuing that the other after he had heard him, was as mery as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their fiege: he tolde him further, that this a The refie of wounderfull chaunce was not only happened vnto the Romaines at that time, but that they had bene acquainted with many other farre more straunge then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to see if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common weale had but harde fuccesse, yet he would procure that his owne private matters might prosper well with him. The V BIAN aunswered him, he would heare them with a goodwill. & againe, and to turne it some other wave from thence, that it should not fall into the sea. This was carried vnto the Senate at Rome, to be consulted of in counsail: and there it was determined they should fend to the oracle of Apollo, at the cittle of Deiphes, and aske him what they should doe therein. So thither were sent great and notable men, Cossus Licinius, Valerius Politus, and Fabius Ambustus: who having ended their iorney by sea, and received aunswer of that they demaunded, returned home againe, and amongest other oracles they brought one that fayed thus. That through negligence they had omitted some auncient ceremonies in the holy dayes of the Latines. And another willed them, that they should by all possible meanes they could keepe the water of the lake ALBANY s that it fell not into the fea, and should (if it were possible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be droncke vp in the middest of the fields. When these oracles were understanded, the priests prepared all things for divine service, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After these things were done, the Senate in the tenth yere of the warres against the VEIANS, put of all those which Comillus cho- dyd beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horse men, Corfor Different nelius Scipio. And before he went in hande with any thing, he made a vowe vnto the goddes, E that if it pleased them to graunte a happy ende of these warres, in honour of them he would celebrate great playes, and buyld a temple vnto the goddeffe which the Romaines call Ma tuta: which seemeth to be her whom we call Leucothea, considering the ceremonies done in Manue. these sacrifices. For they cause a chamber mayde to enter into her temple, & there they boxe her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, and doe embrace their brothers children rather then their owne. They make many other ceremonies, and they are much like vnto those that are done vnto Bacchia nurces, and to the missortunes that chaunced vnto Ino, by reason of her husbands concubine. After all these vowes and prayers made, he entred with his army into the Falissians territories, whom he ouerthrewe in a great battell, toge-of the cittle of V E 125, where perceyuing to take it by affaulte, was not to be wonne without ther with the CAPENATES also, which came to ayde them. From thence he went to the siege F within the castell, harde by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Churche of all the cittie, by mining. and whereunto the cittizens had most deuotion. They saye that euen at that present time the generall of the Thyscans dyd facrifice vnto the goddes, & that his foothefaver having considered the intrells of the beastes offered up in sacrifice, cried out alowde, that the goddes game the victorie vnto him, which should happen to come vpon them in this sacrifice. The Ro-MAINES which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaved B out, crying, and making noyfe with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were fo aftonied. that they fled vpon it, and so the Romaines tooke the intrells, and caried them vnto Camillus. And these be even much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus having by this meanes taken the cittie, and feeing from the toppe of the castell the infinite goodes & riches within the cittie, which the fouldiers spoyled & made hauoke of he wept for very pittie. And when those that were about him tolde him he was a happy man: he lift vp his handes vnto heauen, and made this prayer. O mightie god Iupiter, and you o goddes, which fee and judge camillus mens good and ill worckes: you knowe right well, that we have not willingly (without wrong you as the view mustas the whole cittie being spoyled and rifled, he was also desirous to carie Iunos image to Rome. to that the would willingly vowchesafe to come and dwell with the other goddes, who had the protection of the cittle of Rome. Some faye, that the image aunswered, the was contenred.

But Liuius writeth that Camillus made this prayer, as he touched the image, and that the affistants aunswered she was contented, and would goe with a goodwill. Yet they which doe affirme, it was the image selfe that spake, doe fauour this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of Rome: the which, from so base and meane beginning had imneth fortimes after vanitie and superstition, and otherwhile also dispiseth and contemneth holy and divine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, & not to goe to farre in this, as in all other things belides, it is the best. Nowe Camillus, whether his late enterprise perfor-

had spoken these wordes, and was turning on his right hande (according to the manner of the Romaines after they have prayed vnto the goddes) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somwhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he tolde them that the thing he requested of the goddes was happened vnto him. And that was, a litle hurte, in exchaunge of a great good fortune. So

And we could our selues also tell such like wonders, which we have heard men of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for fuch matters, it Plataches is as daungerous to geue to much credit to them, as alfoto discredit them to much, by reafon of the weaknes of mans nature, which hath no certen boundes, nor can rule it felf, but ron-

weale, & one that was subject to the lawe:he shewed a stately triumphe, set forth with all riche & furniture, & specially for that him self was caried through Rome vpon his triumphant charge of the Visions, drawen with foure fayer white courfers. This, neuer captaine nor generall before him duff vndertake to doe, neither any euer after him attepted it: for they thinke it is a facred cariage. and only mete for the King, and father of the goddes. This bred him much enuy amongest the cittizes, which had not bene acquainted with fo great statelynes. There was another occasion also that made them mislike him much: which was, bicause he stood against the lawe put forth that they should deuide the cittie of Rome. For the Tribunes of the people dvd let out an E. dict, that the Senate & people of Rome should be deuided into two partes: and that those on whom the lotte should fall, should abide still in Rome, and the other should goe dwell in the newe wonne cittle of VEIES. These were the reasons to persuade this: that both the one and R the other forte should be richer then they were before, & should more easely keepe their lands and goodes from the inuation of their enemies, by meanes of these two great citties. The people which were multiplied nowe into great numbers, & had ferued duetifully & daugeroufly, thought it the best waye in the worlde: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with great tumulte, about their pulpit for orations, praying that this lawe might be put vnto the voyces of the people. But the whole Senate, and wifest cittizens among them, judging this motion of the Tribunes would be the destruction, and not the diuision of the cittle of Rome: could in no wife abide it should goe any further. Whereupon they went & prayed Camillus helpe: who fearing to bring it to the pointe, whether the lawe thould paffe or no, dyd allwayes fecke new occafions and letts, still to delaye & put of the matter, & staye the confirmation of this lawe. For c these causes, he was hated of the common people But the originall & apparant cause of the peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the tenth parte of their spoyles: and it cause of the was not altogether without fome reason, and to saye truely the people dyd him much wrong to beare him such malice for that. For before he went to the cittle of VEIES, he made a folene vowe to offer the tenth parte vnto the goddes, of the spoyles of the cittie, if he wane the same, But when it was taken and facked, whether it was that he was lother o trouble the cittizens, or having a worlde of busines in his head, that he easely forgate his vowe: he suffered the souldiers to deutde the spoyle amongest them, & to take the benefit to them selues. Shortely after he was discharged of his charge, he dyd enforme the Senate of his vowe. Furthermore, the footherayers made reporte at that very time, howe they knew by certaine figures and tokens of n their facrifices, that the goddes were offended for forwhat, and howe they must of necessitie be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate presently made an order, where it was vnpoffible euery man should bring in againe the selse same things he had gotten, to make a newe diuifion of enery mans thate: that enery one therefore vpon his othe thould prefent the tenthe parte of his gaynes he had gotten by that bootie. There was great trouble about it. They were driuen to vie great extremitie to the poore fouldiers (which had traueled fore, and taken great paynes in the warres) to make them to restore backe such a coloppe out of their gaine, and the rather bicause many of them had already spent it every penney: and for this trouble, they all cried out with open mouth against Camillus. But he being fet vp, and not knowing otherwife howe to excule him felfe, was forced to bring forth as cold and as vnreasonable an ex-

The people norwithstanding were eger still against him, saying: howe he had vowed then to offer the tenth parte of the enemies goodes to the goddes, and that nowe he would performe it with the tenthes of the cittizens goodes. Neuertheles, euery man having brought that he should for his parte: it was thought good they should cause a massie cuppe of golde to be made, to fend to the temple of Apollo at DELPHES. And small store of golde being in the cittie of Rome, as the officers of the cittie were ferching vp and downe to get it: the women of Rome of their owne voluntary willes without motion, agreed among them felues, that they would departe with all the inells they had, towardes the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof, to honour them withall: the Senate ordeined that they should be prayfed openly with funerall orations at their buriall, as they dyd vse at honorable and noble mens obsequies. For before that lawe, it was not

A the manner to prayle women openly at their funeralles. Nowe there were appointed three of the noblest men of the cittle to goe to carie this offering, & they sent them out in a galley well manned flored also with good mariners, & trimly set forth in all triumphing manner: how beit both in storme, & calme weather, they were in daunger of their liues. For after that they had scaped drowning very narrowly by tempest, when the winde was downe againe, they fell into another daunger, which they escaped also beyond all hope. For harde by the Iles of Eorvs, the gallyes of the LIPARIANS fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the LIPA-BIANS fawe they made no refistance, & intreated them, holding up their hands: they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only fastened their gallye vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the shore, they declared they were pirates, & offered to make porte sale of the men & B goodes, as if they had bene a lawfull prife: & had folde them in deede, had not the wifedome & authoritie of Timelitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the citrie, and had great a docto persuade them to let them goe. And he dyd not so leaue them, but sent out certaine of his owne shippes to accompanie them in their iorney, who dyd helpe them to goe and performe their offering. For which curtefie of his, the ROMAINES afterwardes dyd him great honour at Rome, according to his well deferuing. The Tribunes of the people begame nowe to fet a foote against the laws for the deuiding of the inhabitans of Rome vnto the cittie of VEIES. But the warres of the FALISCES fell out happely at that time, wherby the noble men dyd choose such officers as they would. So they choic Camillus, Tribunus mili- camillus chothe noble men dyd choole fuch officers as they would so they choice of the foundation of the foundatio that caried both authoritie & reputation among them, as an olde experienced fouldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the FALISCES with the ROMAINES armie, where he layed siege vnto the cittie of the FALERIANS, being very well fortified, vitteled and stored, with all other munition of warre, camillus be-Knowing therefore that it was no fmall attempt to winne this cittie, and that it would not be figurb the done in a shorte time: he pollitikely sought (what so euer came of it) to keepe his coutrime oc-should have many occasions to rebell, & raise some civill dissention. For the ROMAINES dyd wifely vse this remedie: to disperse abroade like good phisicians, the humours which troubled the quiet state of their comon weale at home. But the FALERIANS trusting in the situation of D their cittie, which was very strong in all partes, made so litle accompt of the siege: that those which kept not watche vpon the walles, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the cittie. without any weapon about them, and their children went to schoole, the schoolemaster alfo would commonly leade them abroade out of the cittie a walking, to playe and paffe the time by the towne walles. For the whole cittie had one common schoolemaster, as the GRE-CIANS also have, which doe bring up their children from litle ones in company together, bicause one maye be familiarly acquainted with an other. This schoolemaster spying his time to doe the FALERIANS a shrewd turne, dyd accustomably take all his scholers out of the cittie with him, to playe, not farre from the walles at the beginning, & afterwards brought them into the cittie againe, after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroade thus once E ortwife, he trayned them out euery daye a litle further, to make them to be bolde, persuading them there was no daunger. But at the length, one daye having gotten all the cittizes children comillus wor.

cupied about some thing, & to staye them for going home, least by repayring to Rome, they

with him, he led them within the watche of the Romaines campe, & there deliuered all his this after to fcholers into their handes, & prayed them they would bring him vnto their generall. So they the fibooledid. And when he came before Camillus, he begane to tell him that he was schoolemaster vnto mesing the all these children, neuertheles that he dyd more esteemeto haue his grace and sauour, then re-Faterias children. garde his office he had by this name & title . Camillus hearing what he fayed, & beholding his threacherous parte, he sayed to those that were about him. Warre of it selfe surely is an euill ing of comitthing for in warres many injuries & mischieues are done: neuertheles among good men there hand myse is a law & discipline, which doth forbid the to seeke victorie by wicked & traiterous meanes, & prints

When they came thither they faw their childre bringing their schoole, mafter backe againe, starcke naked and bownde, whipping of him, & calling Camillus their father, their god, and their fauiour: fo that not only the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the cittizens also in generall, dyd conceyue in them selues a wonderfull admiration and great loue, of the wifedome, goodnes, and inflice of Camillus. Bicause the ROMAINES preferred inflice aboue victorie, they taught them to be better contented to submit them selues vnto them, then to be their own men at libertie: consessing their vertue dyd more ouercome them, then any force or power could doe. The Senate dispatched letters vnto Camillus, giving him commission to doe and determine as he thought good. So he having taken a certen fumme of money of the FALERIANS, dyd furthermore make peace and league with all the rest of the FALISCES: and thereupon returned backe againe to Rome. But the fouldiers grudged maruelously at it. For they stoode in hope to have had the sacking of the cittie. When there was no remedie, but they must needes returne home emptie handed, C of money of they beganne to accule Camillus to the rest of the cittizens, as sone as they came to Rome, saying: he loued not the common people, and howe for spite he disapointed their army of the peace with all spoyle. On the other side, the Tribunes of the people beganne to reuiue the lawe, for the dethereft of the uiding of the inhabitants of Rome, and were ready to passe it by the voyces of the people. Camilliu not fearing the ill will of the commons, dyd boldely speake, and doe in open presence, all he could against it. So that plainely he was the chiefest cause, that the people against their willes(intreate what they could) were driven to let it alone. But withall they were so spitefull against him, that notwithstanding his forowe and misfortune for the death of his sonne (dying of a fickenes) was great: they would not of malice once take pittle or compaffion of him. The losse whereos (albeit he was of a very good & curteous nature) was so grieuous, and made him D fo vnquiet: that being accused before the people, he sturred not once out of his house, but was locked up with the women, which lamented for his sonne departed. He that dyd accuse him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burdening him that he had stolen and taken awaye, parte of the time acceptat spoyle of the THV SCANS: and sayed, they had seene certen brasen gates at his house, which had bene brought out of Thus can. Nowe the people were for maliciously bent against him, that every man might fee, if they could once take him in a trippe, vpon any advantage whatfoeuer, they would douteles have condemned him . Wherefore calling together his friendes and fouldiers that had ferued vnder him in the warres, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earnestly befought them, that they would not suffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through false and vniust accusations layed against him, nor to be so E fcorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends having layed their heades together, and confulted thereupon, made him aunswer: howe for his judgment they could not remedy it, but if he were condemned, they would all ioyne together with a very goodwill, to helpe to paye thrange mey dearety tourd hisfine. But he being of minde not to beare fuch an open shame and ignominie, determined Camillus: bus in choller to leave the cittie, and to exile him selfe from it. And after he had taken his leave of his wife & children, bidding them farewell: he went out of his house to the gates of the cittie, & fayed neuer a word. When he came thither, he stayed sodainely, & returning backe againe, he lift up his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers unto the godds: that if it were of very ipight and malice, and not of iust deseruing, that the common people compelled him emof Rome. thus shamefully to for sake the cittie, that the ROMAINES might quickely repente them, and F in the face of the worlde might withe for him, and have nede of him. After he had made these prayers against the cittizens (as Achilles dyd against the GRECIANS) he went his way, & was

There tell out so fodainely VPON it, such mischief toward the cittie of Rome, and the present time also brought forth such occasion of daunger and destruction thereof to their shame & infamie: that it was rencertaine whether it happened by chaunce, or els it was the handie worke of some godithat would not

They came (as they faye) of the CELTE, whose country not being able to main? The original teine the multitudes of them, they were driven to goe feeke other countryes to inhabite in; beginning of and there were amongest them many thousands of young men of service and good souldiers, but yet more women and litle children by a great number. Of these people, some of them went towards the north sea, passing the mountaines RIPHEI, and dyd dwellin the extreme

There they continued a long time, vntill they fortuned in the ende to tafte of the wine, which was first D brought out of ITALIE vnto them. Which drinke they found so good, and were so delited with it, that fodginely they armed themselues: and taking their wives and children with them. they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe feeke out the country that brought forth fuch fruite, judging all other countries in respect of that, to be but wilde and barren It is sayed, that Ario a Thurthe first man which brought wine vnto them, and that dyd procure them to passe into I'T A- can the prothe first man which brought wife visit them, and that dyd procede them of party and the life, was a noble man of T HVSCAN called Arron, and otherwise of no ill disposed nature: howbeit he was subject to this misfortune following. But in deede the cause was, that he loued his maistres (Arrons wife) whom fecretly he had enjoyed a long time, and the him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the ende, loue having so possessed them both, that neither parte could withdrawe from other, much leffe culler that they had long enjoyed: the young man stole her away from him, and kept her still by force. But he tooke it so greuously, that he left flice, the cause his country; and having heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide find to conto bring them into ITALIE. So they conquered at their first coming all that country which quest of Thuthe Thyseans helde in olde time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, and stretched famely the out in length from one fea vnto the other which enuironneth ITALIE, as the names them The power of F selues doewitnesse. and leaving to affaulte the cittie, they gaue them audience. The Romaine ambaffadours dyd to falve out with them upon these barbarous people: either bicause they had a desire to proue the valliantnes of the GAVLES, or els to shewe their owne corage and manhoode. So the cittizens went out, and skirmished with them harde by the walles: in the which one of the Fa- D bians, called Quintus Fabius Ambustus, being excellently well horsed, and putting spurres to buffue a Ro- him, dyd set vpon a goodly bigge personage of the GAVLES, that had advanced him selfe farre before all the troupe of his companions. But after he had flaine the GAVLE, and came to strippe him: Brennus then knewe him, and protested against him, calling the goddes to witnesse, howe he had broken the lawe of armes, that coming as an ambaffadour, he had taken you him the forme of an enemie. Hereupon Brennus forthwith left skirmishing, and raising the seige from biux for brea- CLVSIVM, marched with his army vnto ROME gates. And to the ende the ROMAINES king the lare might knowe, that the GAV LES were not well pleased for the injurie they had receyued: to E haue an honest culler to beginne warres with the Romaines, he sent an Herauld before to Rome, to demaunde liverie of the man that had offended him, that he might punish him accordingly. In the meane time, he him felfe came marching after, by small journeys to receyue their aunswer. The Senate hereupon affembled, & many of the Senatours blamed the rashnes of the Fabians: but most of all the priestes called Faciales. For they followed it very earnestly. as a matter that concerned religion, & the honour of the godds: declaring how the Senate, in discharge of all the residue of the cittie of the offence comitted should laye the whole waight and burden of it vpon him alone, that only had done the facte. Numa Pompilius, the justest and Numa Pom. most peaceable of all the kings of Rome that had bene, was he that first erected the colledge pilius creffed of these Feciales, and dyd ordeine that they should be the keepers of peace, and the judges to F heare and allowe all the causes, for the which they should justely beginne any warres. Nevertheles, the Senate in the ende turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the whole will and

There was also at that time eighteene faver great citties in that country, all of them very fitting and well feated, aswell for to enriche the inhabitants thereof by traffike, as to make them to live delicately for pleafure. The people made so litle accopt of their propounded religion, & honour of the godds in that case: that in stede of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemy, they dyd choose him for one of the Tribunes of the fouldiers with his brothers. The GAVLES vnderstanding this, were so fu- The Gaules rious & angrie thereat, that they would no lenger linger their iourneis, but marched with all marche tonfrede vnto Rome. They cotrariwife dyd take nothing at all out of the fieldes, neither dyd any hurte or difpleasure vnto any B bodie: but passing by their citties, cried out they went to Rome, and would have no warres

These barbarous people marching on in this wise towards Rome, the Tribunes of the souldiers brought their army to the field to encounter them . They were no leffe in number them the GAVLES, for they were fourty thousand footemen. Howbeit most part of them were rawe, The Romais fouldiers, that had neuer ferued in the warres before. When their army was nowe brought into the field, they encamped them selues by a litle river called Allia, about the eleueth stone from Rome, and not farre from the place where the same river Allia ft. falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous army to them, who ouerthrew them in battell, proue the poet Hesiodus, for making some days good, & some dayes ill, as though he understood they were not all of one nature: we have writte & declared our opinion therof in other places. Yet, bicause the matter deliuereth present occasió to speake of the same, peraduéture it wil not beamisse to alleage a few exaples of it only. It fortuned the Boe of I and on a time to wine two honorable victories, on the first daye of the moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the A-THENIANS call Hecatombaon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did Still restore the GRECIANS to their libertie. The first was the battell of LEVCTRES. The second was the battell of Geraste, which was two hudred yeres before, when they ouercame Lar-TAMIAS, & the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battail F by the Grecians, the fixt daye of August, at the iorney of Marathon. The third day, at the battell of PLATEBS. And on the felfe same daye, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fine and twenty days, at the fight of Arbeles, the Athenians wanne the battell by fea , neere vnto Niii

And on the twenty of the same moneth, they wanne the battell of SA-LAMINA: as we have written more amplie in our historie of difference of dayes. The moneth of Aprill also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the great ouercame the generall of the king of PERSTA, at the fielde of GRANICA, in the faved moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS allo were vanquished in Sicile by Timoleon, on the seuen & twenty daye thereof. On which daye also it is thought the cittie of TROYE was taken: as Ephorus, Callisthenes, Damastes, and Phylarchus, haue written in their histories. Nowe contrariwife. The moneth of Iulye, which the BOEOTIANS call Panemus hath not bene gratious to the GRECIANS. For on the feuen daye of the same, they were ouerthrowen by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their vtter destruction. They had before also lost a battell B the fame moneth, neere vnto the cittle of CHABRONEA, by king Phillippe. On the fame days alfo, and in the very felf moneth and yere, those which came into I TALLE with king Archida. mus, were flaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the coutry. The CANTHAGI-NIANS also feare the seuen & twenty daye of the same moneth, as the daye which had before time brought them into many great and forowfull calamities. Contrarilie alfo, I knowe very well, how about the feast of mysteries, the cittie of THEBES was destroyed by Alexander, & that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receyue a garrifon of fouldiers into their cittie, about the twenty daye of August, at which time they made the holie procession of the mysteries of Iacchus. And on the felf day the ROMATNES loft their armie, & their generall Capio, who was flaine

And by reason of that day, they reckon two other dayes of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred through feare & superstimang of dayer. tion, which spreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) upon such sinister missortunes. But for this matter, we have written it more largely & exquifitly in the booke we made, of the ceremonies & customes of the Romaines. Now after this battell lost, if the GAVLES had hottely pursued the chase of their flying enemies, nothing could have saved Rome from being taken, & the in-D habitats therof from being put vnto the Iword. For the ROMAINES that fled from the battell, brought such a feare vpon those that received them, and filled the whole cittie of Rome with fuch greif & trébling: that they wist not what to doe. The barbarous people againe, beleeuing litle their victorie was so great as it was, fell to make good cheere for so great a joye received, Capitoll, & storing it with all kind of vitaill, armor, & munition, they wholy dyd for sake the rest of the cittie. But the first worke they tooke in hande was this . They dyd bring into their fayed E forte, parte of their facred relickes: & the professed Vestalls brought thither also their holy fire & all other their holy monumets. Some writers fave, that they had nothing els in keeping, but the sempiternall fyer, & were so consecrated by king Numa, who dyd first institute, that the fyer should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the most motive & quickest substance that is of all naturall things: notwithstanding, that generation also is a mouing, or at the least not done without motion. For we see, that all other substance which lacketh heate, remainethidle, & without action, & flurreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which cra-ueth the force and heate of fyre: as the foule it selfe recouring heate, beginneth somewhat to moue, and disposeth it selfe to doe, and suffer some thing. Wherefore Numa being (as they faye) a man of great learning and vnderstanding, who for his wisedome was reported to talke F many times with the Muses, dyd confecrate the same as a most facred thing, and commaunded that they neuer should suffer that fyre to goe out, and but keepe it, as they would preserve

A the lively image of the eternall God, the only King & maker of the worlde. Other fave, that the fiver burned continually there before the holy & facred things, fignifying a kinde and manner of purification, which opinion the GRECIANS holde also: howbeit behinde the same fver. there were certen hidden things, which in no case any might see, but those holy Vest all Nunes. Many also holde an opinion, that the Palladium of TROYE (as much to fay, as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Aneas into ITALIE. Other doe reporte also, that Dardanus, at that time when he first beganne to buylde the cittie of TROYE, brought thither the holy images of the goddes of SAMOTHRACIA, and he dyd offer them vp there; and howe Frees after the cittle was taken, dyd steale them awaye, and kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALIE. Some other also, that take vpon them to knowe more therein then the B common forte, doe holde opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is emptie and standeth open, the other is full & fast locked vp, howbeit they are not to be seene but by these holy Nunnes. Other thincke also, that these imaginers invented that they spake of their owne heads, bicause the Vestall Nunnes dyd cast all that they could put in at that time.into two pipes, which they buried after in the grounde, within the temple of Quirinus: and herefore that very place carieth the furname at this daye of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the most precious things they had, & fled alongest the river. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying also, & having brought away his wife & litle children, and other household stuffe he had in a carte, by chaunce he lighted vpon the Vestall Nunnes in the waye. But so sone as he perceyued these holy Nunnes (carying the blessed relickes and inells in C their armes, dedicated vnto the feruice of the goddes) all alone, & that they were wearie with going a foote: he caused his wife and his children to come out of the carte, & tooke downe all by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards under the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Ti- C his goodes also, & willed them to get them vp, and flye into some cittle or towne of GRECE. Thus, me thought I could not well passe ouer with silence, Albinus reuerence & deuotion he shewed vnto the goddes, in so daungerous a time & pinche of extremitie. Furthermore the priests of other goddes, & the most honorablest olde men of the cittie of Rome (that had bene Cofuls before time, or had past the honour of triumphe) had not the harte to forfake Rome: but putting on all their most holy robes & vestments dyd vowe, and as it were willingly sacrificed them selves vnto the fortune that should be all them for the safety of their countrie. And vfing certain words & prayers which their high bishoppe Fabius had taught them, they went Fabius chief

Collina, & tooke the fame, litle more the three hudred & three icore yeres after it was first builded if it be true at the least there hath remained any certen chronicles of those times vnto this vncerteine then that, dowtefull vnto vs. But fo it was, that the rumor ranne to GRECE incontiraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) sayeth in a certen booke he wrote of the soule, that there was newes come from the West parte, that an armie which came from the HYPERBO-RIANS, had taken a cittle of GRECE called ROME, lituated in that country neere the great fea.

But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written fo many other fables & lyes) dyd amplifie the true newes of the taking of Rome, with adding to of his owne deuile, of the HYPERBO-

E nently howe Rome was taken, but yet withall form what doubtefully & vncertainely. For He-

D euen thus apparelled into the great market place, & dyd fit them downe there, in chayers of Reme. iuory, expecting the good will & pleafure of the godds what should become of them. But with in three dayes after, Brennus came to Rome with his army: who finding the gates of the cittle Rome taken all open, & the walles without watche, he dowted some deuise in it, & feared some privile ambuth had bene layed, as one hardly beleeuing to have found the Romaines of so base a mind, as to for fake their cittle. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into Rome by the gate

RIANS, & by the great fea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the philosopher had certain know- Aristotle tee ledge it was taken by the GAVLES: howbeit he fayeth also it was recoursed againe afterwards Gimonie of by one called Lucius: where in deede it was by Marcus Camillus, & not by Lucius, But all this in the taking of manner is spoken by coiecture. Moreouer, Brennus being entred Rome, dyd appointe parte of The maiestie F his fouldiers to befrege those which were gotten into mout Capitoll. And he with the residue of the olde of his armie, marched on towards the market place: where when he faw the aunciet Senatours in the market let fo grauely in their chayers, & spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though they saw place of Rome.

their enemies come armed towards them, neither chaunged coutenance, nor culler at all, but A leaned foftely on their staues they had in their hands, seeming to be nothing affrayed nor abashed, but looked one voon another, he maruelously wondred at it. This their so straunge manner at the first dyd so dampe the GAVLE s, that for a space they stoode still, and were in doubre to come neere to touche them, fearing least they had bene some goddes: vntill suche time as one of them went boldely vnto Marcus Papyrius, & layed his hand fayer & foftely vpon his log bearde. But Paprius gave him such a rappe on his pate with his staffe, that he made the bloud ronne about his eares. This barbarous beafte was in fuch a rage with the blowe, that he drue out his fworde, and flewe him. The other fouldiers also killed all the rest afterwardes: and so the GAVLES continued many dayes spoyling and sacking all thinges they founde in the houses, and in the ende dyd set them all a fyer, and destroyed them every one, for despite of B those that kept the forte of the Capitoll, that would not yeld vpon their summons, but valliantly repulsed them when they scaled the walles. For this cause they rased the whole cittie. and put all to the fworde that came in their handes, young and olde, man, woman, and childe. Nowe this fiege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very flowtely, vittells beganne to growe scante in the campe of the GAVLES, in so much as they were driuen of force to feeke it abroade without the cittie. Hereupon they deuided them felues.

gest them, went by fortune towardes the cittle of ARDEA, where Camillus dwelt, living like a private man, medling with no matters of state from the time of his exile, vntill that present time. But then he beganne not to bethinke him felf as a man that was in fafety, and might haue escaped the handes of his enemies, but rather fought to deuise and finde out all the meanes he could to subdewe them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon, considering that the inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to set vpon them, although faynte harted, and cowardly, by reason of the slouth and negligence of their gouernours and captaines, who had whereof some remained still with the King at the siege of the Capitoll: and the rest went a forraging, and spoyling all the champion countrie and villages thereaboutes, scattered as it by this Ganter. were by bandes & companies, some here, some there, searing nothing, nor passing upon watch or warde, they lived in fuche fecur itie of their victorie. and honorable enterprise (although somewhat daungerous) to drive these straungers and barbarous people out of their countrie: confidering that the only ende of their victorie was, but to destroye and consume as fire all that fell into their hands. Wherefore if they would but only take a good lufty harte and corage vnto them, he would with opportunitie, and place, affure them the victorie, without any daunger. The young men were pleafed with these words of life & comforte. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter also vnto the magistrates & counsellours: and having drawen them by persuasion vnto this enterprise, he armed all that E were of age to carie armor, & would not suffer a man to goe out of the cittie, for feare least the enemies (which were not farre of) (hould have intelligede of the same. Now after the GAV LES had rone ouer all the chapion countrie, & were loden with all forts of spoyles, they did encape them selues negligetly in open fields, & neuer charged watch nor warde: but having their full cariage of wine layed them down to slepe, & made no noyse at all in their cape. Camillus being aduertised therof by his seuerall skowtes, caused the ARDEANS with as little noyse as might be, forthwith to goe out into the fields: & having marched formwhat roudly the diffance between the cittie, & the cape of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his foldiers make great showtes & cries, & the trupets to be souded on every side, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the lowde noyle they made, could hardly be made to wake, F they were so deadly droke. Yet there were some notwithstading, that for feare to be take tardy, dyd bustle vp at this sodaine noyse: & coming to them selues, sell to their weapons to refist CaA millus, which were flayne by and by. The rest, & the greatest number of them, laye here & there camillus slue scartered in the middest of the field, without any weapon, dead a sleepe, starcke droncke with the Gaules wine. & were put to the sworde, & neuer strake stroke. Those that fled out of the campe that night (which were but fewe in number) were ouerthrowen also the next daye, by the horse men which followed & killed them, as they tooke them straggling here & there in the fieldes. The brute of this victorie was blowen abroade incontinently through all the townes and villages thereabouts, which caused many young men to come & joyne them selues to Camillus:

but specially the ROMAINES desired the same, that had saued the selves in the cittle of VELES. after the battell lost at ALLIA, who made their mones amongest them selues there, saying, O goddes, what a captaine hath fortune taken from the cittle of Rome? What honour liath the B cittle of Ardea by the valliantnes and worthy deedes of Camillus and in the meane season, his naturall cittle that brought him forth, is now lost, & vtterly destroyed? We, for lacke of a captaine to leade vs, are thut vp here within others walles, & doe nothing but fuffer ITALLE in the meane space to goe to ruine, & vtter destruction before our eyes. Why then doe we not fend to the ARDEANS for our captaine? or why doe we not arme our felues, to goe vnto him? For he is nowe no more a banished man, nor we poore cittizens: fince our cittie is possessed with the forein power, of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counfaill, & fent vnto Camillus to befeche him to be their captaine, and leade them. But he made aunswer, he would in no case consent vnto it, vnles they that were besieged in the Capitoll had lawfully first confirmed it by their voyces. For those (fayed he) so long as they remaine within the cittie, doe represent the state & bodie thereof. Therefore if they commanded him to take this charge vpon him, he would most willingly obey them: if otherwise they misliked of it, that the he would not medle against their good willes & comaundement. They having receased this aunswer, there was not a ROMAINE amongest them, but greatly honored & extolled the wisedome & justice of Camillus. But nowe they knewe not how to make them privile to it, that were befreged in the Capitoll: for they fawe no possibilitie to conuey a messenger to them: considering the enemies were lordes of the cittie, & layed feige to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius amogest Polius Comithe young men(a man of a meane house, but yet desirous of honour & glory) that offered him mine gos ap felf very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he tooke no letters to cary to them which into the Cepit. were belieged for feare leaft they might be intercepted & fo they should discouer Camillus in-D tetion: but putting on an ill fauoured gowne vpon him, he couved certen peces of corcke vnat the length he got ouer to the other fide where the cittie stoode. Then taking vp those lanes allwayes where he thought the enemies were not, feeing fire, & hearing noyfe in other places. he wet to the gate Carmentale, where he found more silece then in other places on the which fide also, the hill of the Capitoll was more stepe and vpright, by reason of the great rocks that were harde to clime vp vpon. But he digged & crept vp fo long amongest them, that he got vp E with great payn vnto the wall of the fortresse, on the which side also the enemie kept no watch: & faluting the watche of the Capitoll, he told them what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them. & brought him to the magistrates that ruled then. Who caused the Senate to affemble presently, vnto whom he told the newes of Camillus victorie, which they had not heard of before: & therewith also he dyd declare vnto the, the determination of the ROMAINE souldiers that were abroade, which was, to make Camillus their captaine & general, & did perfuade them also to graut him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad who the cittizes gaue their pon amogest them selves, & so did chuse Camillus Dietator, & returned the messenger Potius Co- Camillus cheminius backe againe, the felf fame way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe, was fen Dictator like vnto his coming thither: for the enemies neuer fawe him. And so he brought reporte vnto the that were abroad, of the Senates decree & consent, whereof they all were maruelous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of generall vpon him, & found there were twerty thou-confents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitoll, confulted thereu-fand good fighting men abroade, and well armed. Then got he further ayde also of their allies A and confederates, and prepared daylie to goe and fet vpon the enemies. So was Camillus chofen nowe Diffator the seconde time, and went vnto the cittle of VEIES, where he spake with the ROMAINE fouldiers that were there, and leavied a great number of the allies befides, to goe fight with the enemies as sone as he could. But whilest Camillus was thus a preparing. certen of the Barbarous people in Rome, walking out by chaunce on that fide of the Capitol where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: fpied in divers places the printes of his feete and hands as he had griped & gotten holde, ftill digging to get vp & fawe the weedes and erbes also growing upon the rocks, & the earth in like manner, flat troden down. Whereupon they went presently vnto the King, to let him vnderståde the same: who forthwith came to vewe the place. And having confidered it well, he dyd nothing at that time: but when darke ! night was come, he called a companie of the lightest GAVLES together, and that vsed most to digge in mountaines, & fayed vnto them. Our enemies them felues doe shew vs the waye how to take them, which we could not have founde out but by them selves. For they having gone vp before vs. doe geue vs eafely to vnderstade, it is no impossible thing for vs to clime vp also. Where ore, we were vetterly shamed having already begone well, if we should fayle also to end well: & to leave this place as youincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to clime vp to the height thereof: much leffe is it harde for many to get vp one after another, fo that one doe helpe another. Therefore Syrs, I affure you, those that doe take paynes to get yo. shalbe honorably rewarded, according to their just deserte. When the King had spoken their wordes vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it luftely euery man to get vp: & about midnight, they C the formest of them being come to the toppe of the rocke, were now ready to take the walle.

& to set you the watche that slept: for there was neither man nor dogge that heard them. It chauced then there were holy gele kept in the temple of June, which at other times were wont to be fed till their croppes were full but vittells being very straite, & scante at that time euen to ner starued for lacke of meate. This fowle in deede naturally is very quicke of hearing, & fo is the also very fearefull by nature: & being in manner famished with their harde allowance, they I were so much the more waking, & easier to be afrayed. Vpo this occasion therfore, they heard The hale sele the coming of the GAVLES, & also beganne to ronne vp & downe & crie for feare: with which fand the Ca noyle they did wake those that were within the castell. The GAVLES being bewrayed by these foolishe gele, left their stealing vpon them, & came in with all the open noyle & terrour they could. The ROMAINES hearing this larum, every man tooke such weapon as came first to his hand, & they ranne fodainely to refcue that place from whence they understoode the noyfe: Morem Mi- among those, the formest man of all was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Cosul, who had backward down the rocke: & coming afterwards vnto the walle with others that ranne thither with him, he repulsed the rest of the GAV LES that were gotten vp, who were not many in nuber, neither did any great acte. Thus the ROMAINES having escaped this dauger, the next morning they threw the captaine hedlong down the rocks from the castell, who had charge of the watche the night before: & gaue Manlius in recompence of the good service he had done, a more honorable then profitable rewarde, which was this. Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the country wheate, which they call Far, and the fourth parte of the measure of wine, which the Grecian's call Cotile: and this might be about a quarte, being the ordinary allowance of every man by the daye. After this repulse, the GAVLES beganne to be discoraged, partely for that their vitailles fayled them, and durft no more forage abroade in the F fieldes for feare of Camillus: and partly also for that the plague came amongest them, being lodged amongest heapes of dead bodies, lying in enery place aboue ground without buriall,

A and amongest burnt houses destroyed, where the ashes being blowen very high by the winde & vehemecy of heate, dyd geue a drie perfing ayer, that dyd inaruelously poyson their bodies when they came to drawe in the breathe of it. But the greatest cause of all their mischief was, the chaunge of their wonted dyet. Who comming out of a freshe countrie, where there were excellent pleasaunt places to retire vnto, to auoyde the discommoditie of the parching heate of the former, were nowe in a naughty plaine countrie for them to remaine in, in the latter feason of the yere. All these things together dyd heape diseases vpon them, besides the long continuaunce of the siege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the seventh moneth) by reason whereof there grewe a maruelous death in their campe, through the great numbers of them that dyed daylie, and laye vnburied. But notwithstanding all the death and trouble of the B GAVLES, the poore belieged ROMAINES were nothing holpen the more, the famine still dyd growe so fast vpo them. And bicause they could heare nothing of Camillia, they were growen almost vnto a despaire; and send vnto him they could not the GAVLES kept so straight watche vpon them in the cittie. Whereupon both parties finding them selues in harde state, first the watche of either fide beganne to cast out wordes of peace amongest them selves: and afterwards by cosent of the heades, Sulpitius, Tribune of the souldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the ROMAINES should paye a thousand pounde weight of The Romaigolde, and that the GAVLES should incontinently after the receipt of the same, departe out of home to retheir cittie, and all their territories. This decree being passed by othe from both, the golde was deeme their brought. And whe't came to be weyed, the GAV LES at the first privally begane to deale falle-C ly with them; but afterwardes they openly stayed the ballance, and would not let them waye golde. no more, whereat the ROMAINES beganne to be angrie with them. Then Brennus, in scorne & mockery, to despight them more, pluckt of his sworde, girdell and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was wayed. Sulpitius feeing that: asked him what he ment by it? Brennus aunswered him: what canne it signific els, but forrowe to the vanquished. This worde euer after ranne as a common proueibe in the peoples mouthes. Some of the Romai Nestooke this vile parte of theirs in fuch fcorne, that they would needes take the gold from them againe by force, and to returne into their holde, to abide the fiege still, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it belt with pacience to put vp this scorne of theirs, and not to thincke it was a shame to paye more then they had promised: but only to D paveit by copulfion as they dyd, by misfortune of time, was to thincke it rather necessary, then honorable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aswell amongest them selues, as with the GAVLES: Camillus came to Rome gates with his armie, and understanding all what had comillus passed betweene them, he commaunded the rest of the army to marche fayer and softely af-hotte, and tolde him it was not honorably done of him, to breake the accorde that had paffed were to speake to him, if they required ought. For he alone had absolute authoritie to pardone them if they repented, and would aske it: or els to punishe them, and make their bodies aun-fwer the damages and loffe his cuntry had by them fufteyned. These wordes made Brennue madde as a march hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their swordes of all sides, and could fet no battell in order. But Brennus sodainely remembring him selfe that it was no even marche for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had loft many of

F layed lustely one at another as they could, within the houses, and in open streetes, where they ter him in good order, and he in the meane feafon with the best choyse men he had, went before with all speede. Assone as the other Romaines within the cittie had spied him, they showted out for joye, and receased him every one with great reverence, without any more wordes, as their foueraine captaine and prince, who had power ouer them all. And Camillus taking the golde out of the skales, gaue it vnto his men, and commaunded the GAVLES prefently to take vp their skales, and to get them going : for , fayeth he, it is not the Romaines E manner to keepe their countrie with golde, but with the fworde. Then Brennus beganne to be betweene them before by othe. Whereunto Camillus stowtely aunswered him againe, that ac- camillus corde was of no validitie. For he being created Dictator before, all other officers and magi- freakith strates whatsoeuer, & their actes, by his election were made of no authoritie: and seeing there-Brennu king fore they had delte with men, that had no power of them selves to accorde to any matter, they of the Gaulet.

Camillus Di-Etato: Shippe proroged. Camillus ver funded the people what he could to his people. The next night following, he departed out of Rome with all his army, and went to A encape him felf about a three score furlong from thence, in the highe way that goeth towards the cittie of the Gabians. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, & showed at his campe by the breake of daye. The Romaines having taken harte againe vnto them, dyd lustely geue them battell: the same continued longe, very cruell and doubtefull, vntill the GAVLES at the length were ouerthrowen, and their campe taken with great flaughter. As for those that dyd escape the furie of the battell, they were killed, some by the ROMAINES selues, who hottely followed the chase after the battell broken: the residue of them, and the greatest parte, were slaine by those of the citties and villages neere abouts, that dyd fet vpon them as they fled scatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the citie Rome was 7. of Rome ftraungely againe recovered, that was before straungely wonne and lost, after it had B continued feuen moneths in the handes of the barbarous people. For they entred Rome a bout the fiftenth daye of Iulye: and they were driven out againe, about the thirtenth daye of Camillus tri- Februarye following. So Camillus triumphed as befeemed him, and as one that had faued and deliuered his countrie out of the handes of their enemies, and fet Rome againe at libertie. Those that had bene abroade all the time of this siege, came into Rome againe, following his triumphing charrer: and those that had bene besieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue dyed by famin) went and presented them selves before him, and eche one embraced other, in weeping wife for ioye. The priestes and ministers of the temples also, prefented their holy juells, whole and videfaced, which some of them had buried in the ground within the cittle felfe: and others fome had caried awaye with them, when they fled out of C ROME. All these the people dyd as gladly see, as if the goddes them selves had returned home againe into their cittie. After they had facrificed vnto the goddes, and rendred them most humble thankes, and had purged their cittle, as they had bene taught by men experienced in those matters for satisfaction of the goddes: Camillus beganne againe to buylde vp the temples that were there before, harde by the which he buylt another newe one also to the god Mius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Ceditius heard the voyce warne him of the coming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the prieftes great paynes and trauall, the situations of these temples were with muche a doe sounde out againe. But when they were to buylde againe all the rest of the cittie, that was wholy burnt, and destroyed to the grounde: the people had no minde to it, but ever shrinked backe, to put any hande to h the worcke, for that they lacked all thinges necessarie to beginne the same. Furthermore, waying their late and long susteined trouble and miseries, they were fitter to take their ease and rest, then to beginne newe labour and toyle, to kill their hartes and bodies altogether. For, neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reache to the charge of it. Wherefore disposing their mindes to dwell in the cittle of VEIES, Which remained whole, vntouched, and furnished of all thinges to recease them: they delivered to the pratling Orators (whose tongues dyd neuer cease to speake placentia to the people) trimme beaded Ora- occasion to set this matter abroache. So they gave good eare, and were willing to heare certen seditious wordes spoken against Camillus, which were these. That for his private ambition mulie against he would deprive them of a cittie well furnished already, and would against their willes com-Fi pell them to lodge in their owne houses, wholy burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, how he would make them to rayle vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the ende the people might call him, not only captaine and generall of the ROMAINES, but the founder of Rome alfo, & fo drown Romulus honorable title thereof. The Senate confidering of this matter, & fearing some tumulte among the people: they would not suffer Cansillus to leave his Di-Elator (hippe before the ende of the yere, notwith flanding no man cuer enjoyed that office aboue fixe moneths. Then Camillus for his parte dyd much endeuour him felfe, to comforte & appeale the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graves of their auncesters, and put them in minde also of the holy places dedicated to the goddes, and fanctified by king Numa, or by Romalus, or by other Kings. But amongelt many other tokens drawen out of holy and diuine things, he forgate not to bring for example, the heade of a man feature newe and freshe, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as A if that place by fatall desteny had bene once chosen to be the heade and chief of all ITALIE. And moreouer, that the holy fyer of the goddesse Vesta (which sence the warres had bene kindled againe by the holy Vestall Nunnes) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did for sake their naturall cittie, besides the great shame and dishonour it would be vnto them. to see it inhabited in time to come by vnknowe straungers, or els to be left a common field and pasture, for beastes and cattell to graze in . Such sorowfull examples and griefes, the honeft naturall borne cittizens, dyd euer blowe into the peoples eares, aswell prinately, as openly. The people againe to the contrarie, dyd make their hartes to yerne for pittie, when they layed before their eyes their penurie, and pouertie they fusteined: and befought them also not ro enforce them to gather and ioyne together againe the broken peces of a spoyled cittie (as B of a (hippewracke that had cast them naked into the sea, having only saued bare life and per-fones) sence that they had another cittie neere at hande and ready to recease them. So Camillus counsell was, that the Senate should consulte vpon this matter, and deliuer their absolure opinion herein: which was done. And in this counsell, he him self brought forth many probable reasons, why they should not leaue in any case, the place of their naturall birth and country: and so dyd many other Senatours in like case, fauoring that opinion. Last of all, after these persuasions, he commaunded Lucius Lucretius (whose manner was to speake first in such affemblies) that he (hould frand vp and deliuer his opinion, & that the rest also in order as they fat should fave their mindes. So every man keeping filence, as Lucretius was ready to speake, at that present time there passed by their confaill house, a captaine with his bade that warded

C that daye, who spake allowed to his ensigne bearer that went formest, to staye, and set downe his ensigne there: for, sayed he, here is a very good place for vs to warde in . These wordes being heard up into the Senate house, even as they stoode all in a doubte & maze what would be the resolution of this matter: Lucretius beganne to saye, that he most humbly thancked the goddes, and allowed of the captaines judgment, and so every one of the rest in their order, fayed as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull chaunge and alteration of minde sodainely among the common people: for enery man dyd perfuade & encorage his fellowe liuely to put his hand to this worke. Infomuch as tarying for no division or appointing out of streetes, nor fetting out every man his place he should builde in: they fell to worke of all handes, everie one Rome is built chofing that place he liked best, & was most comodious for their building, without any other against

D order or division amongest them. Whereupon, they ronning to this building on a head, the streetes were cofused on heapes together, & their houses all built out of order & vniformitie. For the reporte goeth, that the whole cittie (as well comon as private buildings) was built vp new againe in a yere. But the furueyours, to whom Camillus had geuen charge to finde out all news built as the holy places where the teples had bene ouerthrowen: as they went about mount Pallatine, gaine in a they came by chaunce to the place, where the chappell of Mars had stoode, which the GAV- yer. LES had wholy burnt and destroyed, as they had done all the rest. They making cleane the place, and furueying every corner, dyd finde by chaunce Romulus augures crooked staffe hid-Romulus auden under a great mount of ashes. This staffe is crooked at one of the endes, and they call it gover staffe Lituus, which foothefayers doe vie to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will found to provide the state of the factor of the element, when they will found to the factor of the element, when they will found to the factor of the element, when they will found to the factor of the element, when they will found to the element of the eleme

E beholde the flying of birdes to tell of things to come . Romulus that was very skillfull in this was burne. arte, dyd vse this staffe: and after he was taken awaye from all mens sights, the priests tooke it. and kept it as a holy relicke, suffering no creature to laye hands on it. Nowe they founde this ftaffe whole and vnbroken, where all things els were confumed and perished by fire, they were in a maruelous ioye thereat. For they interpreted this to be a figne, of the euerlasting continuaunce of the cittie of Rome. But before they could make an ende of all their building, there grewe a newe warre againe vpon them. For at one very instante, all the Æ QVES, the VOLSCES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and mayne into the territories of the ROMAINES. The THYSCANS also went then and belieged SYTRIVM, that was in league & amitie with the ROMAINES. The Tribuni militares got them straight to the field with their

F armie, and encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES besieged them so straightely, that comillus chotheir army stoode in great daunger to be ouerthrowen, & they were driven to sende to Rome for Diffact to for a newe supplie. Thereupon the Romaines dyd choose Camillus Distator againe the third first, which I doe conceyue to be but a tale. They saye the LATINES sent vnto the ROMAINES, to demaunde some of their free maydes in mariage: which they dyd either to make a quarell of warre, or els as desirous in deede, to iovne both the peoples againe by new emariages. The ROMAINES were amased very much at this, and fore troubled, as not knowing howe to aunfwer them, they were so affrayed of warres. For they were yet scante newe setled at home, and dreaded much lest this demaunde of their daughters, was but a summons made to geue them hostages, which they finely cloked vnder the name of alliace in mariage. Some saye that there was at that time a bonde may de called Tutola, or as some saye, Philotis, that went vnto the Senate, and counselled them they should fende her awaye with some other fayer maydes slaues, dressed vp like gentlewomen, & then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this denise, B and chose such a number of bonde maydes as she defired to haue, & trimming them vp in fine apparell, begawded with chaines of golde and itells, they fent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not farre from the cittie. When night was come, the other maydes hyd their enemies swords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) dyd clime vp to the toppe of a wilde figge tree, from which the shewed a burning torche vnto the Romaines, having made shifte to hange somwhat behinde her, to keepe the light from sight of the enemies. For this fignall the Senate of Rome had fecretly appointed her to fet vp, which was the cause that the iffuing out of the fouldiers being commaunded to goe out in the night, was full of trouble and tumulte. For being pressed by their captaines, they called one another, and there was great Rome deline- a doe to put them into order of battell. Thus they went to take their enemies fleeping, who C red for wares nothing miltrusting the same, were slaine the most parte of them within their cape. This was done on the fifte day of the moneth called then Quintilis, & now is named Iulye: at which time they doe yet celebrate a certaine feast in remembraunce of that acte. For first of all, going out of the citie, they call allowed many of their fellowes names which are most common: as Cains, Marcus, and Lucius, showing thereby howe one of them called another after that forte, as they went in great haste out of the cittie. Afterwardes all the mayde servauntes of the cittie being The maydens trimmely apparelled, goe playing up and downe the towne, pleasauntly leasting with those featte, called they mete: and in the ende they make as though they fought together, in token that they dyd helpe the Romaines at that time to destroye the Latines. Then they are feasted, sitting vnder bowers made with wilde figge tree boughes: and this feaste daye is called, None D Capratine, by reason of the wilde figge tree (as some thincke) from the toppe whereof, the bonde mayde shewed to the Romaines the burning torche. For the Romaines call the wilde figge tree, Caprificus. Other fave, that all these things are done and spoken, in remembrance of the mischauce that happened vnto Romulus, whe he was taken out of their fight, the fame day without the gats of the citty, at which time there rose a sodain miste & darke clowd. Or as some other saye, that then was the eclypse of the sunne and they holde opinion that the day was named None Capratine, bicause Capra in the Romain togue, signifieth a goate. Romalus vanished out of mens sightes, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neere vnto the place which is called goate marthe, as we have mentioned more at large in his life. The 2.0ccasion & beginning of this warre (according to the opinion of most writers) was, that Camillus E being chosen Dictator the third time, & knowing that the Trib militares with their army were straightly besieged by the LATINES, and VOLSCES: he was inforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priviledged from further service in warres. And having setched a great copasse about mout Martian, bicause he would not be seene of his enemies, he came to lodge his campe behind them, where he raifedfiers, to make the Romaines knowe that were besieged, how he was come: which as fone as they peciued, they tooke to the corage again, & determined to fight. But the LATINES & VOLSCES kept within their cape, & dyd entrenche & fortifie the felues with a wall of wodd, which they layed a croffe, bicause they saw they were beset both before & behind: & determined to tary the releefe of a new fupply, as well of their owne, as of some further ayde besides fro the THYSCANS, which thing Camillus pceauing, & fearing F least they should serue him, as he had already hadled the by copassing of him again behind: he thought it necessary to preuet this. So cosidering the inclosure & fortificatio of their cape was

A all of worde, and that every morning commonly, there came a great winde from the fide of camillus firms the mountaines, he made promition of a number of fire brandes. And leading out his armic against the into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one parte of them to geue charge vpon the energy and the same against the same mies on the one fide, with great noyle and showting : and he with the other parte determined Volleton to rayle fier on the corrary fide, from whence the winde should come, looking for oportunitie to doe the same. When he sawe the sunne vp, and the winde beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the fide of the hilles, & that the skirmishe was begonne on the other side: then he gaue a fignall vnto the companie he led with him, to fet vpon the enemies, and made them throwe into the inclosure of their campe, divers potts & dartes with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catche holde of, in this inclosure of worde, & trees layed ouerthwart, dud raise

B straight an exceding great same in the ayer, & still got waye inwards into the LATINES cape. Whereupon the LATINES being unprouided of present remedy to quenche the same, and feeing their campe a fyre all about their eares: they gathered them selues together at the first in a very small roome. Neuertheles, they were inforced in the ende to get them into the field, & there they founde their enemies ready armed, & in battell raye. So as fewe of those escaped Camillus flue that came into the field, & their fellowes that remained within their cape, were burnt to death the Landers with fyer, vntill the ROMAINES them selves came to quench it for greedines of their spoyle & goodes. When all this was done, Camillus left his sonne in the campe, to keepe the prisoners & poyles: & he him felf, with the rest of the armie, went to inuade his enemies contrie, where he

tooke the cittle of A QVES. Then after he had ouercome the Volsces, he led his army pre- tooke the ci-C fently from thence vnto the cittle of SVTRIVM. For he had not yet harde of their misfortune. sie of Aeques. Therefore he hasted him self to ayde them, bicause he thought they were yet besieged by the THYSCANS. But suche was their harde fortune, that they had already yelded vp their cittie by composition, & saued no parte of their goodes, but the very clothes they had on their backs. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the waye as they were wandring abroad lamenting their miserie, with their wines & little young children: whose miserie went to the very harte of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, when he sawe the ROMAINES weepe for pittle also, to see the mone that these vnfortunate people made vnto him, and that it greued them hartely to beholde their great mischaunce; he determined with him felf not to deferre reuenge, but presently to goe the selfe same daye before the cittie

D of SVTRIVM, imagining that he should finde the THVSCANS out of order, without keeping watch, & attending nothing but making good cheere, bicause they had newly taken a wealthy riche cittie, where they had left neuer an enemy in the same to hurte them, neither feared any abroad to come neere to affaulte them. And in deede it fell out rightly as he geffed. For he had not only passed through the territories of the cittie, without any intelligence genen to the enemies within the fame: but he was come to the very gates, and had taken the walles, before they hard any thing of his coming, by reason they neither kept watch nor warde, but were difperfed abroade in the cittie, in enery house, eating and drincking droncke together. Insomuch as when they knew their enemies were already within the cittie, they were so full fraight with meate & wine, that the most of their wittes serued them not so much as to slye, bursaried vn-E till they were flaine or taken, like beaftes in the houles. Thus was the cittle of Sythiy Mills was the cittle of Sythiy M taken in one dave. And it chaunced that those which had wonne it, lost it: & those which had wed Sunt.

Who deserved both the honour and entrie of triumphe into Rome: the which wanne him no leffe good will and glorie, then the two first before had done prayle, and gotten fame. For euen his greatest enemies that most spighted and enuied his former noble actes, afcribing them rather to fortune that fauored him then to his valliantnes or worthines: were forced nowe by this deede of his to confesse, that his wisedome and valliantnes deserved prayse and commendation to the skyes. Camillo of all his enemies had one most bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the first man that gaue the GAVLES the repulle that night they had entered the walles of the Capitoll, the capitolly

F and had thought to have taken it: whereupon they gave him the furname of Capitolinia: He mu man afpiring to be the chief of the cittle, & finding no direct waye to exceede the glory of Camillus, tooke the broade highe waye of them that practile tyrannic. For he beganne to flatter O iii

Flattery and the common people, and specially those that were indebted: he tooke upon him to defende A their causes, and pleaded their case at the barre against their creditours. Sometimes he tooke numein the multimate or the debters out of the creditours handes and caried them awaye by force, that for lacke of common per- abilitie to paye, were by rigour of the lawe condemned to be bonde flaues. But by this praetife, in shorte time he gotte him a maruelous number of suche needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honest cittizens were affrayed of the insolent partes they played. and of the continual troubles and tumultes they daylie stirred up in the market place. Therefore suspecting the worst in this case, they dyd choose Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who caufed the fayed Manlius immediately to be apprehended, and committed him to prison, Whereupon the people beganne to chaunge their apparell: which they were neuer wont to doe, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing least some comotion would B ryse hereupon, they dyd set him at libertie againe. He being thus out of prison, was no whit the better, nor wifer thereby, but dyd still stirre up the commons, more boldely and seditiously, then before. Then was Camillus chosen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accused in his time of office. But when this matter came to pleading, the fight of the Capitoll troubled his accusers much. For the very place it selfe where Manlius had repulsed the GAYLES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was eafely feene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing; and he him felfe pointing with his hande, shewed the place vnto the goddes, and weeping tenderly he layed before them the remembraunce of the hazarde of his life, in fighting for their safety. This dyd moue the judges hartes to pittie, so as they knew not what to doe, but many times they dyd put ouer the hearing of his case vnto another daye, and (neither would they geue judgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifest proofes: neither could they vie the feueritie of the lawe you him, bicause the place of his so notable good feruice was ever still before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cause of delaye of iustice, dyd make the place of judgement to be remoued without the cittle, into a place called the wodde Petelian, from whence they could not fee the Capitoll. And there the accusers gaue apparent euidence against him: and the judges considering all his wicked practifes, conceaued a just cause to punishe him, as he had deserved. So they gave sentence of death against him: that he should be caried to the mount Capitoll, and there to be throwen downe hedlonge the rockes thereof. Thus, one, and the felfe place was a memory of his notable good seruice, and also a memoriall of his miserable and vnfortunate end. Besides all this, D they rased his house, and built in the same place a temple to the goddesse they call Moneta: and made a lawe also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the mount Capitoll, Camillus after this, being called againe to take the office of Tribunus militaris the fixt time: he fought to excuse him selfe aswell for that he sawe he was well stepte in yeres, as also for that he feared fortunes spight, or some mishappe, after he had obteined such glorie for his noble actes and feruice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sickenes, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allowe no excuse by any meanes, but cried out, they dyd not defire he should fight a foote nor a horse backe, but that he should only geue counsaill, and commaunde: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, against E their enemies the PRENESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who ioyning together, dyd inuade the confines of the ROMAINES friendes. So he led his army out immediately to the field, and camped as neere the enemy as he could: being minded for his parte to drawe the warres out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if neede required) when he had recouered strength. But Furing contrarilie coueting glorie, was whottely bent to hazarde the battell, whatfoeuer perill came of it: and to this ende he sturred vp, and incoraged the captaines of euerie private bande. Wherfore Camillus fearing leaft they should thinke for ill will be bare the young men. that he went about to hinder and take awaye the meanes to winne their honour, and to doe fome noble acte: fuffered Furius against his will to put his men in order of battell, and he in the meane feafon by reason of his sicknes, remained with a fewe about him in the campe. So F and Vollets, went Lucius vpon a head to present battell to the enemie, & so was he as headilie also ouerthrowen, But Camillus hearing the Romains were overthrowen: ficke as he was upon his

The ROMAINES seeing this that were already entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they sawe him, they gathered together, and put them selues againe in arraye before him, and persuaded one another not to forfake their captaine. So their enemies hereupon stayed their chasing, and would purfue no further that daye. But the next morning, Camillus leading his armie into the fielde, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force : and following the victorie harde, he entred amongest them that fled into their campe pelmel, or hand ouerheade, and flue the most parte of them even there. After this victorie, he was advertised howe the camillas

After this, the Thussans he returned to Rome with an exceeding spoyle, confirming by experience, the wisedome of as Survivin. the ROMAINES, who dyd not feare the age nor ficknes of a good captaine that was experte and valliant: but had chosen him against his will, though he was both olde and sicke, and preferred him farre before the younger and lustier that made sute to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THYSCYLANIANS were revolted, they fent Camillus Camillus Camillus Camillus C thither againe, willing him of fine other companions to take out one he liked best, enery of again, against

But he refusing all other, dyd chose againe Lucius Furius beyounde all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needes would against his will hazarde battell, in which he was ouerthrowen. Howbeit Camillus, having a defire (as I thincke) to hyde his faulte and shame he had receased: dyd of curtesie preferre him before all other. Nowe the THYSCYLANIANS hearing of Camillus CO- The craste of ming against them, subtilly sought to culler the faulte they had already committed. Where the Thington fore they put out a great number of people into the fields, some to plowe, other to keepe the beaftes, as if they had bene in best peace : and dyd set the gates of the cittie wide open, sent their children openly to schoole, their artificers wrought their occupation in their shoppes, D the men of haniour & honest cittizens walked in the market place in their long gownes. & the officers and gouernours of the cittie went vp and downe to euery house, commaunding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMAINES, as if they had stoode in no seare at all, and as though they had committed no faulte. Howbeit all these fine fetches could not make Camillus beleeve. but that they had an intent to rebell against the ROMAINES: yet they made Camillus pittie them, feeing they repented them of that they had determined to doe. So he commaunded them to goe to Ro wato the Senate, to craue pardone of their faulte: and he him felfe dvd helpe them, not only to purge their cittle of any intent of rebellion, but also to get them the priviledge and freedome of ROME. And these be the chiefest acts Camillas dyd in the fixt time of his tribuneshippe After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great sedition in the cittie; betwene Gree sedition

For he would in any case that of the two Consuls, which moved in were chosen yerely, the one of them should be a commoner, and not that both of them should Rome by Libe of the auncient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were chosen, but the election of the Confuls, the people flayed fo that the common wealth went to decaye, and declined to greater troubles, then euer it dyd before, for lacke of gouernment, Butto suppresse this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was fore against camillus his will bicause it milliked the people muche. mischief, and knowing the daye the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the paffing of their A have by voyces of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations fet vpon postes, that the fame very daye he would muster the people, and all was but to drawe them from the market place into the field of Mars, and dyd fer great penalties vpon those that should be lacking at the musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrarie parte, dyd withstande his threates, and sware they would condemne Camillus selfe in fiftie thousand Drachmas of filuer, if he dyd not let the people alone, but would goe about to disturbe them for geuing their voyces to such lawe, as they liked of. Camillus perceauing this, and fearing to be condemned, and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him. being nowe an olde man, and one that had done fo many great and notable actes, or els for that he thought him selfe not strong enough to withstande the force of the people: he kept B his house that daye, fayning him selfe to be sicke, and certaine other dayes following, and in the ende he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the fame Licinius Stolo general of the horse men, that was the author and furtherer of all this sedition: and besides dyd suffer him to preferre another lawe, and to passe it by voyces of the people, that aboue all other lawes, dyd most trouble the Patricians, Which lawe dyd forbid any cittizen of Rome, to have, or occupie aboue fine hundred ingera, which amount to 330 acres and a halfe, 12 pole, and 121 partes of a pole . Then was this Stolo alofte. and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despite of the Senate established this law. Howbeit shortely after it was found out, that him self had more number of acres then his Sield the first owne lawe permitted. By reason whereof, he receaued the juste punishment of his owne de-C uised forfaiture. Yet the most weightie matter of all this diffention that beganne first, and most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Confuls, remained still undetermined. But while these matters were thus in talke, the ROMAINE's had certen intelligence, howe the GAVIES were departed once againe from the Adriaticke sea, and were coming with a great power straight vnto R o M E: vpon reporte of which newes, the warres followed immediately. For the GAVLES destroyed the champion country as they went: and the poore country men that could not recouer Rome, were scattered here and there amongest the mountaines. The feare of this dyd somewhat appeale the diffention. The people then affembling with the Senate, and the baser sorte with the noble, dyd all with one voyce and affent chuse Camillus comillus cho- Dictator the fifte time. He was nowe a very olde man, lacking little of foure score veres; but ne- D uertheles, confidering the necessitie and present daunger, without framing any excuse, or starting as he had before, he vindertooke the charge. Nowe that he had taken it vpon him, he presently leused men, and prepared his army. And knowing very well howe the fiercenes of these barbarous GAVLES consisted, in downe right blowes with their swordes, with which they would strike of heades and shoulders of men at a blowe, mangling them like bouchers, without any cast or skyll of fight: he caused iron salletts, and morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothely wrought on the out side as could be, that their swordes lighting on weapon to them, should either slyde of, or breake. Moreouer, he caused their sheldes to haue barres made about them of copper, bicause the wodde selfe was not able to abide their blowes. Furthermore, he dyd teache his fouldiers to cary long iauelines or punchion staues, where E with they might wounde their enemies lifting vp their fwordes to strike them. Nowe when the GAVLES were come neere Rome, having pitched their campe vpon the river of Anian, and being full loden and stuffed with all kindes of spoyle and booties: then Camillus brought his armie also into the fielde, and went to lodge on a little hill which was easie to get vpon, where there were many litles caues, so that the most of his army was all hidden and couered, and those that were seene, seemed to be retired thither into those highe places for an aduantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder: dyd fuffer them to come and spoyle even to the foote of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept him selfe quiet in his campe and well fortified. Vntill fuch time as he spyed occasion of advantage, that the best parte of their F army were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the fieldes: and those which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drincking, as they vied carelefly at all howres. Then Ca-

A millus sent very early before daye, his lightest armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in coming out of their campe, and to let them in any case from putting their men in order of battell: and he at the breake of daye, came downe into the plaine, and dyd fet his other men being well armed, in good arraye, which were a great number, and luftie fellowes, and were not as the barbarous people thought, fewe, and fearefull. This at the very first difcoraged the hartes of the GAVLES maruelously, bicause they thought them selves dishonored, that the ROMAINES should charge upon them first. Afterwardes also Camillus vantgarde dyd fet vpon the GAVLES, and that on a sodaine, before they had ley sure to put them felues in battell, or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chaunce. In the ende also, Camillus came vpon the neckes of them, with R all his whole force, and army together: against whom they ranne notwithstanding, holding vp their naked fwordes alofte in their handes. But the Romaine's thrusting with their armed iauelinges, receased their enemies blowes upon them, and thereby fo rebated the edges of their fwordes (their blades being very sharpe and thinne grounde, and of so softe a temper) that they bowed againe, and stoode crooked vnreasonably; and furthermore, having persed their shieldes through with their punchingstaues, the GAVLES armes were so cloud and wearied with them, the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw a vay their twordes and shieldes, and flying in closed with the Romaines, and caught holde of their fauelines, thincking by plaine force to have wrested them out of their handes. Howbeit they perceauing then the GAVLES were naked, fell straight to their swordes: and so was Camillus flat C the flaughter of their first ranckes very great. The other fled scatteringly here and there, all a- the Gaules bout the plaine: bicause Camillus had caused all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and poffeffed. Neither dyd they retire towardes their campe, for that it was vnfortified, and also knewe well enough it would be easely taken. This battell (as they fave) was thirteene yeres after their taking of ROME before. But after that fielde, the ROMAINES COrages were good enough against these barbarous GAVLES, whom they stoode in feare of before: thincking the first time they came, that they had not ouercomed them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongest them, or through some other straunge chaunce. For they dyd so feare them at that time, that they made a lawe, howe their priestes should The Romaibe exempted from warres, so it were not against the GAVLES. This ouerthrowe was the last exempted marshall acte Camillus dyd in the warres. For, the taking of the cittle of VELITRES, was an prieffer from accident depending upon this iorney: bicause they yelded straight unto him, without striking the wares. any stroke. But the seditions of the people of Rome about government, and the choofing of the yere Confuls, was the hardest matter he euer had in hande. For they returning home to Rome ftronge, and of greate power, by their late obtained victorie: woulde in any case have one of the Consuls to be chosen of a commoner, which was directly against their auncient custome. But the Senate stowtely withstoode it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authoritie, which was greate then, that they should mainteine and continue their auncient dignitie, and prerogative of their nobilitie. But as Camillus was fet in his chayer in the market place, where he hearde and dispatched causes: there came a sergeante to him, sent from the Tribunes of the people, who commaunded him to followe him, and there withall layed violent handes vpon him, as he woulde haue caried him awaye by force. This made fuche a terrible Sedition as tumulte and vprore, that the like was neuer seene before in the market place. For Ca- Rome about millus friendes draue the sergeaunte backe behinde the chayer. The common people cried choosing of out againe to the fergeant from beneath, pull him out of his chayer. This fo amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to faye to the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne vp his office, but taking those Senatours he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept. And there, before he would goe into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, & made his prayer vnto the goddes, that it would please them to F bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vowe and promise (if these tumultes and troubles might be pacified) that he woulde builde a temple of Concorde. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and di-

The Dictator having openly published to the people the Senates decree, confirming their defire: the common people were so joyfull, that at that presente they let fall all their malice against the Nobilitie and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house, with greate (howtes of ioye, and clapping of handes. The next morning all the people being affembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of concorde should be built at the common wealthes charge (according to the vowe Camillus had made) in such a place, as it might be seene from the market place selfe, where all the affemblies for matters of counfell were made. And further, it was ordered that one daye more should be added to the feastes of the LATINES: & that from thenceforth they should be folemnise foure festivall dayes, & should presently make generall facrifices vnto the goddes,

It is enough for a King to bestowe his leysure somtime to A heare musitians singe, and he doth much honour to the muses to heare the masters of the fcience otherwhile, when one of them fingeth to excell another. But he that perfonally shall bestowe his time, exercising any meane science: bringeth his paynes he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a witnes against him selfe, to proue that he hath bene negligent to learne things honest and profitable. And there was neuer any young gentleman nobly borne, that seeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the cittie of Pisa) defired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for feeing of Juno in the cittie of A R G o s: nor that defired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleasure somtime to reade their workes. For it followeth not of necessitie, that though the worke delight, the workeman must needes be prayfed. And so in like case, such things doe not profit those which behold them bicause they doe not moue asfection in the hartes of the beholders to followe them, neither doe stirre vp affection to re-

The power of femble them, and much leffe to conforme our felues vnto them. But vertue hath this fingular propertie in all her actions: that the maketh the man that knoweth her to affect her fo, that ftraight he liketh all her doings, and defireth to followe those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only defire to have them in possession: but of vertue, we chiefly loue the deedes, Wherefore, we are contented to have goodes from other men: but good deedes we would other should have from vs . For vertue is of this power, that she allureth a mans minde prefently to vie her, that wifely confidereth of her, and maketh him very defirous in his harte to followe her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only understanding and knowledge of vertuous deedes, which sodainely bringeth unto C him a resolute desire to doe the like. And this is the reason, why me thought I should continew still to write on the liues of noble men, and why I made also this tenthe booke: in the which are conteined the lines of Pericles, and Fabius Maximus, who mainteined warres 2. gainst Hanniball. For they were both men very like together in many fundry vertues, and specially in curtesie and instice: & for that they could paciently beare the sollies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were maruelous profitable members for their countrie. But if we have forted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you shall easely judge that reade our writings of their lives. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the towne of CHOLARGVS, and of one of the best & most auncient families of the cittle of Athens, both by his father and mother. For Xanthippus his D father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA in the iorney of Mysala) maried Meariste that came of Clisthenes, he who draue out of ATHENS Pifistratus of spring, and valliantly ouerthrewe their tyrannie. Afterwards he established lawes, and ordeined a very graue forme of gouernment, to mainteine his cittizens in peace and concorde together. This Agariste dreamed one night, that she was brought a bed of a lyon: and very thortely after the was delinered of Pericles, who was so well proportioned in all the partes of his bodie, that nothing could be mended, fauing that his head was formwhat to long and out of proportion to the rest of his bodie. And this is the only cause why all the statues & images of him almost, are made with a helmet of his head: bicause the workemen as it should seeme (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the bleamishe of his deformitie. But the ATTA E CAN poets dyd call him Schinocephalos, asmuch to saye, as headed like an onyon. For those of ATTICA doe somtime name that which is called in the vulgar tongue Seilla, that is to saye, an onyon of barbarie: Schinos . And Cratinus the Comicall poet in his comedie he intituled Chirones, fayed:

Olde Saturne he and dreadfull dyre debate begotten have bes ovene them Carnally, this tyranne here this heavy sollting pate, in courte of goddes so termed wvorthely. And againe also in that which he nameth Nemesis, speaking of him, he sayethe Come Inpiter, come Inpiter, Come iolithead and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him also, sayeth in a place:

Somtimes he standes amazed when he vercemes. u i ili ua bis voyce i u i that harde it were. Sufficiently to knowne. in wwhat estate his vouernment he leaves. And then will be be feldome feene by lovve. suche heavy heapes with in his braynes doe grouve. But yet fomtimes out of that monstruous pate he thundreth fast and threatneth every state.

And Eupolis in a comedie which he intituled Démi: being very inquifitiue, and asking parricularly of every one of the Orators (whom he fayned were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the last man vnto him, he saved:

> Truely thou hast now brought, unto us here that devell, the chief of all the captaines that come from darkfomehell.

And as for mulicke, the most authors write, that Damon dyd teache him mulicke, of whose Pericles flui name (as men faye) they should pronounce the first syllable shorte. Howbeit Aristotle dies and reafaveth, that he was taught mulicke by Pythoclides. Howfoeuer it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderstanding, and subtill in matters of government: for, to hide from the people his fufficiency therein, he gaue it out he was a musitian, and dyd reforte vnto Pericles, as a master wrestler, or fenser: but he raught him howe he should deale in marters of state. Notwithstanding, in the ende he could not so conningly conuey this matter, but the people fawe his harping and mulicke, was only a vifer to his other practife: wherefore C they dyd banish him A THENS for five yeres, as a man that busilie tooke you him to chaunge the state of things, and that fauored tyrannie. And this gaue the Comicall poets matter to playe vpon him finely: among which Plato in a comedie of his, bringeth in a man that afketh him:

> O Chiron tellme first : art thou in deede the man, which dyd instruct Pericles thus? make aunswer if thou can.

He was formtime also scholler to the philosopher Zenon, who was borne in the cittle of E- Zenon Elec-LEA, & taught natural philosophie, as Parmenides dyd: but his profession was to thwarte and team contrary all men, and to alledge a world of objections in his disputation, which were so intricate, that his aduerfarie replying against him, knewe not howe to aunswer him, nor to D conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliasius witnesseth in these wordes.

> Zenon vvas subtill sure and very eloquent. and craftilie could wrinde a man, by waye of argument, if so he wwere disposed, his cunning to descrie, or shouve the sharpenes of his writt to practife pollicie.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was most familiar and conversaunt with him. and dyd put in him the maiestie and granity lie shewed in all his sayings, and doings, who dyd farre excell the common course of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be shorte, he it was that dyd facion his manners, altogether to carie that graue countenaunce which he dyd. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nasias finish to laye, E as vindentanding. Either bicause they had his singular wit and capacitie in suche great allmiration, being growen to fearche out the cause of naturall things : or that he was the full man, who dyd afcribe the disposition and government of this world, northing fortune on fai tall necessitie, but voro a pure, simple, and voderstanding minde, which durh separate at the first moving cause, the substaunce of suche like partes as are medied and edmpounded of dis uers substaurices, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruelous bucheof Anakagoras, who had fully infitructed him in the knowledge of naturalithings and of thois specially that worke about in the ayer and firmiament. For he greye not only to have a great mundo and an eloquenctongue, without any affectation por groffe countries ettites: bui to a mer addicerten modelt countenaunce that scantly smyled, very sober in his gates having so kynde of having in thote founde in his voyce that he never loft nor altered, and was of very honest behaulour, never A troubled in his talke for any thing that croffed him, and many other fuche like things, as all that fawe them in him, and confidered them, could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof the reporte goeth, there was a naughty bufy fellowe on a time, that a whole dave together dyd nothing but rayle ypon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face. with all the villanous wordes he could vse . But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a worde againe, dispatching in the meane time matters of importaunce he had in hand, vntill night came, that he went foftly home to his house, shewing no alteration nor semblaunce of trouble at all, though this lewde varlet followed him at the heeles, with wordes of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his owne doores, being darke night, he commaunded one of his men to take a torche, and to bring this man home to B his house. Yet the poet Ion fayeth, that Pericles was a very prowde man, and a stately, and that with his gravity and noble minde, there was mingled a certaine scorne and contempt of other; and contrarilie, he greatly prayleth the civillitie, humanitie, and curtefie of Cimon, bicause he could facion him selfe to all companies. But letting passe that which the poet Ion fayed: who would that vertue should be full of tragicall discipline, bringing in with it, a certaine faryricall discourse to moue laughture. Nowe Zennon contrariwise dyd counfell all those, that sayd Pericles gravity was a presumption, and arrogancie: that they should also followe him in his presumption. For, to counterfeate in that forte things honest and vertuous, doth secretly with time breede an affection and desire to loue them. and afterwardes with custome euen effectually to vse and followe them . So Pericles by C keeping Anaxagoras company, dyd not onely profit him felfe in these things, but he learned besides to put awaye all superstitious seare, of celestiall signes and impressions seene in the aver. For to those that are ignoraunte of the causes thereof, suche sights are terrible, and to the godly also feareful, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, bicause they have no certaine knowledge of the reason that naturall philosophy yeldeth, which in steade of a fearefull fuperstition, would bring a true religion accompanied with affured hope of goodnes. Some faye a man brought Pericles one daye from his farme out of the countrie, a rammes head that had but one horne, and that the prognosticator Lampon considering this head, that had but one strong horne in the middest of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the signifihead that had cation thereof. That being two tribes and seuerall factions in the cittle of ATHENS tou-D ching gouernment, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both should be brought into one, and specially into his parte, in whose house this signe dyd happen. Further, it is fayed that Anaxagoras being present, dyd cause the rammes head to be clouen in two peces, and shewed vnto them that stoode by, that the brayne of this ramme dyd not fill the panne of his naturall place, but inclosed it felfe in all partes, being narrowe like the poynte of an egge, in that parte where the horne tooke his first roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruelously esteemed at that present by all those that stoode by: but so was Lampon, fone after that Thucydides was driven awaye, and that the government of the whole common weale fell into the handes of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall philosopher and the prognosticator dyd rightly mete ! together in trothe: the one directly telling the cause, and the other the ende of the euent as it fell out. For the profession of the one, is to know howe it commeth : and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to foretell what it betokeneth. For where some save, that to shewe the cause, is to take awaye the fignification of the figne: they do not consider that in feeking to abolishe by this reason the wonderfull tokens and signes in the ayer, they doe take awaye those also which are done by arte. As the noyse of basons, the lightes of fyre by the fea fide, and the shadowes of nedles or pointes of dyalles in the sunne: all which things are done by some cause and handyworke, to be a signe and token of some thing. But this argument peraduenture maye ferue better in another booke. And nowe against o Perioles, Whileft he was you but a young man, the people stoode in awe of him, bicause he somwhat re-F fembled Pilitram in his countenaunce : and the auncientest men of the cittle also were

A in those he was Pifistratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very riche and wealthy, and of one of the noblest families of the cittie, and those were his friendes also that caried the only fwave and authoritie in the state: whereupon, fearing least they would banishe him with the banishement of Ostracismon, he would not medle with government in any case, although otherwise he shewed him selfe in warres very valliant and forward, and feared not to venter his persone. But after that Aristides was dead, that Themistocles was driven awaye, and that Cimon being euer in service in the warres as generall in forreine countries, was a long time out of GRECE: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of Greece: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the minimum of the poore communaltie, about the small number of Nobilitie and riche men, the which was beginning to directly against his nature. For of him selfe he was not popular, nor meanely genen: but he deale in the

B dydit (as it should seeme) to auoyde suspition, that he should pretend to make him selfe como wealth. King. And bicause he sawe Cimon was inclined also to take parte with the Nobilitie, and that he was fingularly beloued and liked of all the honester forte; he to the contrarie enclined to the common people, purchasing by this meanes safety to him selfe, and authoritie against Gimon. So he prefently beganne a newe course of life, since he had taken vpon him to deale in matters of state: for they never fawe him afterwardes at any time goe into the cittie, but to the market place, or to the Senate house. He gaue vp going to all feastes where he was bid- To much faden, and left the entertainment of his friendes, their company and familiaritie. So that in all breedth conhis time wherein he gouerned the common weale, which was a long time, he neuer went out semps. to supper to any of his friendes, vales it were that he was once at a feast at his nephew Eury-

C ptolemus mariage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremonie was a doing, when they offer wine to the goddes, and so he rose from the table. For these friendly meetings at fuche feastes, doe much abase any counterfeate maiestie or set countenaunce : and he shall have much a doe to keepe gravity and reputation, shewing familiaritie to every knowen friende in fuch open places. For in perfect vertue, those things truely are euer most excellent, which be most common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto straungers, then their dayely conversation is to their friendes. Pericles nowe to prevent that the people should not be glutted with seeing him to ofte, nor that they should come much to him: they dyd fee him but at fome times, and then he would not talke in every matter, neither came muche abroade among them, but referued him selfe (as Critolaus fayed

D they kept the SALAMINI AN galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importaunce. And in the meane feafon, in other matters of finall moment, he delt by meanes of certaine orators Ephialies and his familliar friendes, amongest whom Ephialtes (as they save) was one: he who tooke awaye order. the authoritie and power from the courte of Areopagus, and dyd geue to muche libertie to the people, as Plato fayed. Vpon which occasion, as the Comicall poets saye, he became so flowte and head strong, that they could no more holde him backe, then a younge vnbrideled colte: and tooke fuch a corage vpon him, that he would obaye no more, but inuaded the Ile of E V B O E A, and fet vpon the other Handes. Pericles also bicause he would facion a phrase of speache, with a kynde of style altogether agreable to the manner of life and grauit e he had taken upon him: he gaue him felfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, F. shadowing his reasons of naturall philosophie, with artificiall rethoricke. For having obteined a deepe understanding by studying of philosophie, and a ready waye effectually to ende any matter, he vndertoke to proue (besides that nature had endued him with an excellent witte and capacitie, as the dinine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ferue his purpose)

he dyd so artificially compasse it with eloquence, that he farre passed all the orators in his time. And for this cause was he das they saye) surnamed Olympius, as muche to saye, as hea- VVhy Periuenly or diuine. But some are of opinion he had that surname, by reason of the common named observations. buildings and stately workes he raysed up in the cittie of ATHENS, that dyd muche set pine. forth the same. Other thinke it was geuen him for his great authoritie and power he had in gouernment, aswell in warres, as in peace. But it is no maruaill that this glorie was F geuen him, confidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the comedies the Poetes caused to be played in those times (in which there were many wordes spoken of him, some in earnest, some in sporte and least) doe witnesse that he had that furname genen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he A thundered and lightened in his oration to the people, & that his tongue was a terrible light. ning. And touching this matter, they tell of an aunswer Thucydides, Milesius sonne, should pleasauntly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydides was a noble man and had long time contended against Perioles in matters of the common weale. Archidamus, king of LACEDEMON, asked Thurydides on a time: whether he or Persoles wrestled best. Thu. cydides madehim aunswer. When I have geven him an open fall before the face of the world, he can so excellently deny it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all. and persuadeth them the contrarie of that they sawe. Notwithstanding he was ever very graue and wife in speaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to speake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the goddes, that nothing might escape his mouthe, & but that he might confider before whether it would ferue the purpose of his matter he treas ted on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vales it be some sewe lawes he made, and but very fewe of his notable fayings are brought to light, faue only these. He sayed on a time that they must take awaye the cittle of ÆGINA, bicause it was a strawe lying in the eye of the hauen Pir E A. And another time, he fayed that he faw the warres a farre of, comming from Peloponnesus. Another time, as he tooke shippe with Sophoeles (his companion in commission with him as generall of the armie) who commended a fayer young bove they met as they came to the hauen: Sophoeles, fayed he, a gouernour must not only haue his handes but also his eyes cleane. And Stelimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the prayle of those that were flaine in the warre of Samos: he fayed they were immortall as the goddes. For we doe not fee the goddes (fayed he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happines they enjoye, we doe conjecture they are immortall: and the same things are in those that dye in seruice, and defence of their countrie. Nowe where Thueydides doth write the government of the common weale under Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobilitie, and yet had apparaunce of a popular state: it is true that of the people, as we have fayed before, only to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne.

But comming farre shorte of his wealthe and abilitie, to carie out the porte and charge that Cimon dyd, entertaining the poore, keeping open house to all commers, clothing poore olde people, breaking open besides all inclosures and pales through all his landes, that euery one might with more libertie come in and take the fruites thereof at their pleafure; and

For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got D their living paynefully with fivet of their browes: became nowe to be very vaine sumptuous. and riotous, by reason of these things brought vp then. The cause of the alteration doth eafely appeare by those things. For Pericles at his first comming, sought to winne the fauour in this distribution of the common money, as Aristotle writeth. And having wonne in a shorte time the fauour and good will of the common people, by distribution of the common treasure, which he caused to be deuided among them, aswell to have place to see these playes, as for that they had rewarde to be present at the judgementes, and by other suche like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, dyd inuey against the courte of the Areopagites, wherof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his happe to be yerely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the facrifices, nor mafter of the warres: all which were offices chosen in auncient time by lot. And further, those on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued them selues well in their office, they were called forwards, & raised to be of the bodie of this courte of the Areopagites. Pericles nowe by these meanes having obtained great cre- F dit and authoritie amongest the common people, he troubled the Senate of the Arenagites in fuche forte, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe:

A and in time made Cimon to be banished ATHENS, as one that favored the DACED AM DE Periode canand in this characteristic common wealthe and authoritie of the people. But Perioles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to departe thence as a banished man. And this was the cause that Pericles fought that daye more valliantly then ever he dyd, and he wanter the honour and name to have done more in the persone of him selfe that days then any to ther of all the armie. At that battell alfo, all Cimons friends, whom Perioles had burdened likes wife to favour the LACE DEMONIANS doings, dyed every man of them that days. Then the

How is Idomeness to be credited nowe, who accuseth Perioles that he had canted comens the orator Ephialtes to be flaine by treason (that was his friende, and dyd allwayes counsell him, and take his parte in all kinde of gouernment of the common weale) only for the fealous fie and enuie he dyd beare to his glorie? I can but muse why Idomeneus should speake so flautiall rigour to the vttermost: his enemies layed waite for him by meanes of one Wristodical TANAGRIAN, and they killed him by treason, as Aristotle writeth. In the meant time Cinton The muchon dyed in the Ile of CYPRVS, being generall of the armie of the ATHENIAMS by leas Where of Ephialies.

fore those that tooke parte with the Nobilitie, seeing Pericles was nowe growen very great; and that he went before all other cittizens of A THENS, thincking it good to have some one to

F sticke on their side against him, and to lessen thereby somewhat his authoritie, that he might Thurydides not come to rule all as he would: they raised vp against him, one Thucydides, of the towne of Pricks ad-ALODECIA, a grave wife man, and father in lawe to Cimon. This Thueydides had leffe skill of come neath warres then Cimon, but vnderstoode more in civill government then he, for that he remained A most parte of his time within the cittie: where continually invaying against Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people, in shorte time he had stirred vp a like companie against the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer forte (which they call Nobilitie) from mingling with the common people as they were before, when through the multitude of the commnons their estate and dignitie was abscured, and troden vndersoote. Moreouer he dvd separate them from the people, and dyd affemble them all as it were into one bodie, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and dyd put (as a man will faye) a counterpease into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little secret grudge only between these two factions, as an artificiall flower set in the blade of a sworde, which made those shewe a litle, that dyd leane vnto the people: and the other also somwhat that fauored the Nobilitie, R But the contention between these two persones, was as a deepe cut, which deuided the cittle wholy in two factions: of the which the one was called the Nobilitie, and the other the communaltie. Therefore Pericles geuing yet more libertie vnto the people, dyd all things that might be to pleafe them, ordeining continuall playes and games in the cittie, many feaftes, banckers, and open pastimes to entertaine the commons with suche honest pleasures and deuifes: and belides all this, he fent yerely an armie of three score gallyes vnto the warres, into the which he put a great number of poore cittizens that tooke paye of the state for nine moneths of the yere, and thereby they dyd learne together, and practife to be good sea men. Furthermore he fent into the countrie of CHERRONESVS, a thousand free men of the cittie to dwell there, and to decide the landes amongest them: five hundred also into the Ile of Na. C. 20 s: into the Ile of AND ROS, two hundred & fiftie: into THRACIA, a thousand to dwell with the BISALTES: & other also into ITALIE, when the cittle of SYBARIS was built againe, which afterwardes was furnamed the cittle of the THVRIANS. All this he dyd to ryd the cittle of a number of idle people, who through idlenes beganne to be curious, and to defire chaunge of things, as also to prouide for the necessitie of the poore townes men that had nothing. For, placing the natural cittizens of ATHENS neere vnto their subjects and friendes, they served as a garrison to keepe them under, and dyd suppresse them also from attempting any alteration or chaunge. But that which deliteth most, and is the greatest ornament vnto the cittie of ATHENS, which maketh straungers most to wonder, and which alone doth bring sufficient testimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the auncient power, riches, and great wealthe p of GRECE, to be true and not false: are the stately and sumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the cittle of ATHENS. For it is the only acte of all other Pericles dyd. and which made his enemies most to spight him, and which they most accused him for, cryretted by ing out you him in all counsailles & assemblies: that the people of ATHENS were opely defamed, for carying awaye the readymoney of all GRECE, which was left in the Ile of DELOS to be fafely kept there. And although they could with good honestie have excused this facte, faying that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the ende to lave it vp in a more stronger place, where it should be in better safetie: yet was this to ouergreat an injurie offered vinto all the rest of G R & C B, and to manifest a token of tyrannie also, to beholde before their eyes, howe we doe employe the money, which they were inforced to E gather for the maintenaunce of the warres against the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and fetting forth our cittie, like a glorious woman, all to be gawded with golde and precious stones, and howe we doe make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull & infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrarie, and declared vnto the ATHENIANS that they were not bounde to make any accompt of this money vnto their friendes and allies, confidering that they fought for their fafety, & that they kept the barbarous people farre from GRECE, without troubling them to let out any one man, horse, or shippe of theirs, the money only excepted, which is no more theirs that payed it, then theirs that received it, so they bestowe it to that vie they receyued it for. And their cittie being already very well furnished, and prouided of all things necessary for the warres, it was good reason they should employe and bestowe the F furplus of the treasure in things which in time to come (and being throughly finished) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he fayed that whileft they continue building, they should

A be presently riche, by reason of the diversitie of workes of all sortes, and other things which they should have neede of: and to compasse these things the better, and to set them in hande. all manner of artificers and worke men(that would labour) should be fet a worke. So should all the townes men, and inhabitants of the cittie, receive paye and wages of the common treasure: and the cittie by this meanes should be greatly beawtified, and muche more able to mainteine it felfe. For fuche as were stronge, and able men of bodie, and of yeres to carie weapon, had paye and entertainment of the common wealthe, which were fent abroade vnto the warres; and other that were not meete for warres, as craftes men, and labourers; he would also they should have parte of the common treasure, but not without they earned it, and by doing formwhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupie R the common people with great buildings, and deuiles of works of divers occupations, which could not be finished of long time: to the ende that the cittizens remaining at home, might haue a meane and waye to take parte of the common treasure, and enriche them selves as well as those that went to the warres, and served on the sea, or els that laye in garrison to keepe any place or force. For fome gayned by bringing stuffe: as stones, braffe, yuory, gold, ebbany, & cypres. Other got, to worke and facion it: as carpinters, grauers, fownders, casters of images, Disers arisis masons, hewers of stone, dyers, goldsmithes, joyners working in yuorie, painters, men that set core a diffe. in fundrie cullers of peces of stone or wodde, and turners. Other gayned to bring stuffe, & to furnishe them: as marchaunts, mariners, and shippemasters, for things they brought them by sea. And by lande other got also: as carte makers, carters, carters, corde makers, sadlers, coller-

C makers, & pyoners to make wayes plaine, & miners, & fuch like. Furthermore, euery science and crafte as a captaine having fouldiers, had also their armie of the worke men that served them labouring truely for their liuing, who serued as pretises & iorney men under the workemafters: fo the worke by this meanes dyd disperse abroade a common gayne to all fortes of people and ages, what occupation or trade foeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to rife in greatnes & fumptuousnes, being of excellent workemanshippe, & for grace & beautie not comparable; bicaufe every workeman in his science dyd strive what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greatest in fight, and to be most workemanly done in showe. But the greatest thing to be woundred at, was their speede and diligence. For where euery man thought those workes were not likely to be finished in many mens lines and ages & D from man to man: they were all done and finished, whilest one only gouernour continued still in credit and authoritie. And yet they fave, that in the fame time, as one Agatarchus boafted him felf that he had quickly painted certen beaftes: Zeuxu another painter hearing him aunfwered And I contrarilie doe rejoyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For comonly flight and fodaine drawing of any thing cannot take deepe cullers, nor geue perfect beawty to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the cullers to continue for euer. For this cause therefore the workes Perioles made, are more wonderfull: bicause they were perfectly made in so shorte a time, and have cotinued fo long a feason. For every one of those which were finished up at that time, seemed then to be very auncient touching the beawtie thereof: and yet for the grace & continuance F of the same, it looketh at this daye as if it were but newly done and finished, there is suche a certaine kynde of florishing freshnes in it, which letteth that the injurie of time cannot impaire the fight thereof: As if every one of those foresaid workes, had some living spirite in it, to make it feeme young and freshe: and a soule that lived ever, which kept them in their good continuing state. Now the chief surveyour generall of all these workes, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent worke mafters in euery science & occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthénon (as a man would faye, the temple of the virgine, and is furnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote enery waye) was built by Ittinus, and Callicrates: and the chappell of Elewin (where the secret ceremonies of the mysteries were made) was first founded by Corabus, who raised up the first pillers in order, standing beneath F on the ground, and dyd fet them vp vnto the master chaptrells. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of X YPETA, turned the arches ouer, and then dyd fet the pillers in order also which are aboue: and Xenocles of the towne of Cholarda, was he that made the lanterne or toppe of the steeple which conereth the fanctuarie: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles him felfe gene order for the building of it, was done by Callisrates, who vndertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this worke, to fee how flowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing faying:

> Pericles long a goe dyd ende this wworke begonne: and build it highe with glorious woordes if so it had bene done. But as for deedes (in dede) he built nothing at all, but let it stande: as yet it stands much liker for to fall.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for mulicke, where they heare all mulicians playe, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with divers feates & degrees, and many ranges of pillers, but the toppe of the roofe is altogether rounde, which is somwhat hanging h downeward round about of it selfe, comming together into one pointe. And it is sayed that this was made after the patterne and facion of king Xerxes royall panilion, and that Pericles was the first deuiser and maker of it. Wherefore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the Thracians, doth playe very pretily vpon him, faying the first the form of the Pericles here doth come, Dan Inpiter furnamed,

from banishment, and daungers deepe, wherein he long dyd passe. I would Pericles was the first that made maruelous earnest labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the daye of the feast called Panathenaa, they would set up games for C musicke. And he him selfe being chosen ruler of these games, as judge to rewarde the best deferuer: ordained the manner the musitians should euer after keepe in their singing; playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other instruments of musicke. So the first games that euer were for musicke, were kept within the Odeon: and so were the other after them also .ener celebrated there. The gate and entring into the castell was made and finished within the space of five yeres, under the charge of Mnesicles, that was master of the workes. And whilest these gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chaunce, which declared very well that the goddesse Minerua dyd not mislike the building, but that it pleased her maruelously. For one of the most painefullest workemen that wrought there, fell by mischaunce from the height of the castell to the grounde, which fall dyd so sore broose him, and he was so sicke D with all, that the phisitians and surgeons had no hope of his life . Pericles being very forie for his mischaunce, the goddesse appeared to him in his sleepe in the night, and raught him a medicine, with the which he dyd eafely heale the poore broofed man, & that in shorte time. And this was the occasion why he caused the image of the goddesse Mineraa (otherwise called of healthe) to be cast in brasse, and set vp within the temple of the castell, neere vnto the altar which was there before, as they faye. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the base: Who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reason of the good will Pericles bare him, he commaunded all the other workemen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill spoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias receyued the gentlewomen of the cittie into his house, E vinder culler to goe fee his workes, and dyd conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this brute, the Comicall poets taking occasion, dyd cast out many slaunderous speaches against Pericles, accurails of list-fing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and lieutenante in the warrest der against and burdened him further, that Pyrilampes, one of his familiar friends also, brought up fowle, and specially peacoks, which he secretly sent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at these Satyres, that make profession to speake slaunderously against all the worlde, as it were to facrifice the injuries and wronges they cast vpon honorable and good men, to the spight and enuie of the people, as vnto wicked spirites: considering that Stefmbrotus THASIAN durft fallely accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne fonnes wife. And this is the reason, in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the F perfect knowledge of the trothe of auncient things, by the monuments of historiographers:

considering long processe of time, doth vtterly obscure the trothe of matters, done in former

A times. For enery written historic speaking of men that are aline and of the time of things. whereof it maketh mention: fomtime for hate and enuie, fomtime for fauour or flatterie. doth disguise and corrupt the trothe. But Pericles perceyuing that the orators of Thurwdides faction, in their common orations dyd still crie out you him, that he dyd vainely waste and confume the common treasure, and that he bestowed vpon the workes, all the whole renenue of the cittie; one daye when the people were affembled together, before them all he asked them, if they thought that the coste bestowed were to muche. The people auniwered him:a great deale to muche. Well, faid he then the charges shalbe mine (if you thinke good) and The mobile none of yours: prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely, soing of Pe-When Pericles had fayed fo, the people cried out alowde, they would none of that (either bi-R cause that they wondred at the greatnes of his minde, or els for that they would not geue him the only honour and prayle to have done to fumptuous and stately workes) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any colle. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, & putting it to an aducture which of them should hanishe other, with the banishment of Ostracismon: Pericles got the vpper hand, and banished banished banished banished banished by Thursdides out of the cittie, & therewithall also overthrewe the contrarie faction against him. Priviles. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the cittle againe to vnitie & concorde, he founde then the whole power of ATHENS in his handes, and all the ATHENIANS matters Perides at his disposing. And having all the treasure, armour, gallyes, the Iles, and the sea, and a mar-uelous seigniorie and Kingdome (that dyd enlarge it selfe partely ouer the GRECIANS, and C partely ouer the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of nations subject vnto them, with the friendshippe of Kings, & with the alliance of divers other Princes & mightie Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to chaunge his manners, and from that he was wont to be toward the people, and not so easely to graunt to all the peo- Pericles some ples willes and defires, no more then as it were to contrarie windes. Furthermore he altered what altereth his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernment which he vied vntill that time, as to de-

ment, or rather to a kingly authoritie: but yet held still a direct course, and kept him self euer vpright without fault, as one that dyd, fayed, and counfelled that, which was most expedient for the common weale. He many times brought on the people by persuasions and reasons, to D be willing to graunt that he preferred vnto them: but many times also, he draue them to it by force, & made them against their willes doe that, which was best for them. Following therein the deuise of a wise phisitian: who in a long and chaungeable disease, doth graunt his pacient somtime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sorte : and another time also he doth geue him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioge fo great an empire: many times misfortunes doe chaunce, that fill them full of fundrie passions, the which Pericles alone could finely steere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: brideling with ther comforting their grief and discoragement in advertitie. Wherein he manifestly proved, E that rethorike and eloquence (as Plato fayeth) is an arte which quickeneth mens spirites at her The force of pleasure, and her chiefest skill is, to knowe howe to moue passions and affections throughly, eliquence. which are as stoppes and soundes of the soule, that would be played vpon with a fine fingered hande of a conning mafter. All which, not the force of his eloquence only brought to paffe, as Thucydides witnesseth; but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had Pericles com-

For, when he had brought his cittie not onely to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authoritie exceeded many Kings and tyrannes, yea even those which by their willes and testaments might have left great possessions to their children: he neuer for all that increased his fathers goodes and patrimonie left him, the value

But this was not for a litle while, nor in a geere of fauour, that should continue for a time : but this helde out fortie yeres together; he being allwayes the chief of his cittie amogest the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, & the The cydides. For after he had prevailed against Thucydides, & had banished him: he yet remained chief about all other, the space of fifteene yeres. Thus having atteined a regall dignitie to co. maunde all, which continued as aforefaid, where no other captaines authoritie endured but Paides fee one yere: he euer kept him selfe vpright from bribes and money, though otherwise he was no

Pericles vnderstanding this, ranne presently to him as a man halfe cast awaye, and prayed him as earnestly as he could, that he would dispose him selfe to line, being not only forie for him. but for him selfe also, that he should lose so faithfull and wise a counseller, in matters of state Anaxagoras and gouernment. Then Anaxagoras shewed his face, and tolde him: O Pericles, those that E will see by the light of a lampe, must put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now beganne the LACED EMONIANS to growe lealous, of the greatnes of the ATHENIANS, wherefore Periles to make the Athenians hartes greater, and to drawe their mindes to great enterprises: set downe an order they should fend ambassadours, to persuade all the GRECIANS (in what part soeuer they dwelt in Evrops, or Asia, aswell the litle as the great citties) to send their deputies vnto Athens, to the generall affembly that should be holden there, to take order for the temples of the goddes which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the facrifices cell to be hal- they had vowed for the preservation of GRECE, when they gave battell vpon them: and touching sea matters also, that every man might sayle in safetie where he would, & that all might liue together in good peace & loue, one with another. To performe this commission, twenty F persones were sent of this embasiate, euery one of them being fiftie yeres of age and vpward. Whereof fine of them went to the Dorians, dwelling in Asia, and to the inhabitants of the

And the other five went first into the Ile of E v B OR A, and from thence vnto the O B T B I A N S, and through all the gulfe of MALEA, vnto the PHTIOTES, vnto the ACHAIANS, and the THESSALIANS: declaring to all the people where they came, the ATHENIAN'S commission, persuading them to send vnto ATHEN S, and to be present at the councell which should be holden there, for the pacification & vnion of all GRECE. But when all came to all nothing was done, & the fayed citties of GRECE dyd not affemble, by practife of the LACED EMONIANS (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the first refusal that was made of their summons, was at P B LO-PONNES YS. This haue I written to make Pericles noble corage to be knowen, and howe profounde a wife man he shewed him selfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was chosen ge- Perille lo-

And when Che fawe Tolmides, the fonne of Tolmaus (trusting to his former victories, and the praise & commendation of his good feruice) dyd prepare vpon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the countrie of BOBOTIA, & had procured also a thousand of the lustiest & most valliant men of the cittie to be contented to goe with him in that iorney, ouer and about the rest of

CHERRONES VS was best thought of and esteemed, bicause it fell out to the great benefit and

was he likewise much honored & esteemed of straungers, when he dyd enuironne all Paro-

For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iorney (by change or otherwise) ynto the fouldiers ynder his charge. And afterwardes, going with a great name marnelous well appointed vnto the realme of Pontvs, he dyd there gentily vie and intreate the citties of GRECE, and graunted them all that they required of him: making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great force & power of the ATHENIANS, who failed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the coastes of the sea under their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteene gallyes, with certen number of fouldiers under captaine Lamachus, to defend them against the tyranne Timesileus: who being expulsed, and driven a. B waye, with those of his faction, Pericles caused proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that fixe hundred free men of the cittie, that had any defire to goe, without copulfion, might goe dwell at Sin Opa, where they should have devided among them, the goodes & landes of the tyranne & his followers. But he dyd not followe the foolishe vaine humours of his cittizens, nor would

Pericles would not fol- and of fitche a power, and befides, to have good lucke, would needes once againe attempt to love the coneconquer E g ypr, and to revolte all the countries ypon the fea coastes, from the empire of the toufnes of the king of PERSIA: for there were many of them whose mindes were maruelously bent to attept the vnfortunate enterprise of entering Sicilia, which Alcibiades afterwardes dyd muche The enterpricke forward. And some of them dreamed besides, of the conquest of Thuscan, & the em- C prife of Sicipire of CARTHAGE. But this was not altogether without some likelyhood, nor without occaaffayres, which fell out according to their owne defire. But Pericles dyd hinder this going out, and cut of altogether their curious defire, employing the most parte of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: judging it no fmall matter to keepe downe the LACE-DEMONIANS from growing greater. For he was allwayes an enemie to the LACEDEMO-NIANS, as he shewed him felte in many things, but specially in the warre he made, called the Lacedemoholy warre. For the LACED EMONIANS having put the PHOCIANS from the charge of the teple of Apollo in the cittle of DELTHES, which they had viurped & having restored the DELTHES, PHIANS againe vnto the fame: fo fone as they were gone thence, Pericles went also with ano. had graunted them, to be the first that should make their demaundes of the oracle: he having atteined the like priviledge of the Phocian's, made his image also to be graven on the right fide of the fame image, of the brasen woulfe. Nowe howe wisely Pericles dyd gouerne GRECE

He durft not offer them battell being to great a number of valliant fouldiers; but hearing that king Pliftomax was yet but a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counfell & direct him) he fought privile to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had wonne him fone with his money, he perfuaded him to drawe backe the PELOPONNESTANS out of their countrie of ATTICA: and so he dyd. But when the LACEDENIONIANS fawe their armie caffed, & that the people were gone their wave, every man to his owne cittle or towne: they were so mad at it, that the King was condemned in a great fome. The King being vnable to aunswer his fine, which was so extreme great; he was b driven to ablent him felf from LACED EMON, Cleandrides on the other fide, if he had not fled in time, even for spight had bene condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deedes doe plainely shewe. For first of all, the countrie fully considered also, for certen vile parses he had played, was likewise banished from Sp. A. T. A. Strategia in as we have more amply declared in the life of Lylander. And Perioles delivering up the accopt siele. of his charge, and fetting downe an article of the expense of tenne talentes he had employed, Grippur robor should employe in needefull causes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking question the treasure of how nor which waye, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certen Lyfander fens writers (amog whom the philosopher Theophratius is one) who write that Pericles sent verely him with all to vnto Sparra tenne talets, with the which he entertained those that were in authoritie there, bicause they should make no warres with them : not to buye peace of them but time, that Pericles wife TLELANS, whom he chafed deane out of all the countrie, and placed in their cittie, only the citizens of ATHENS! And the cause why he delt so rigorously with them was , bicause they having taken a galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards betwene the ATHENIANS and LACEDEMOuelous gifte and power the had, that the could entangle with her loue the chiefest rulers and friendshippe of the greatest persones of all GRECE, and wanne all those that dyd haunte her company to be at the king of Persiaes commaundement. So that she fowed through all the citties of GRECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MEDES: for they were the greatest men of power & authoritie of euerie cittie that were acquainted with her. But as for Alpafia, fome fave that Pericles reforted vnto her, bicause she was a wise woman, and had great vnderwith his friends: and those that vied her company also, brought their wives many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine about her were to entertaine fuch as would warme of a clubbithe nature, came to be the chief man of ATHENS, by frequenting the companie of Apssis, after the death of Pericles . And in Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleafauntly written, yet in that, this storie is written truely: that this

Apafia was repaired vnto by divers of the ATHENIANS, to learne the arte of retho-rike of her . Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely that the affection Pericles dyd beare

To conclude, this Apalia was to famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against king Artaxers xes his brother, for the empire of P. E. R. SIA) called Albaffa his best beloved of all his gonor. bines, which before was called Milto, and was borne in Procines, being Hermotimus daugh ter, And Cymus being flayne in the field, Apalia was carried to the King his brother with whom afterwardes the was in great fauour. As I was writing this life this ftorie came in my minder and me thought I thould have delt hardly, if I thould have left it vnwritten. But to our mark ter againe! Péricles was charged that he made warres against the Samtans on the beliefe of the MILESIANS, at the request of Apalia: for these two citties were at warres together, for the cittle of PRIENA but the SAMIANS were the stronger. Now the ATHENIANS COMMAND ded them to laye a fide their armes, and to come and pleade their matter before them, that the right might be decided; but they refused it viterly. Wherefore Revieles went thirther & tooke awaye the government of the final number of Nobilitie, taking for oftages, fiftie of the chiefest men of the cittie, and so many children besides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of & LEMNOS. Some fave every one of these oftages offered to geve him a talent : and besides those, many other offered him the like, such as would not have the sourcine authoritie put into the handes of the people. Moreouer Piffuthnes the PERSIAN, lieutenant to the king of PERSIA, for the good will he bare those of SAM os, dyd fend Pericles tenne thousand crownes to release the oftages. But Pericles neuer tooke pennie: and having done that he determined that Pericles at Samos, and established a popular government, he returned against to Athens, Notwithwas not come franding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediatly after, having recovered their oftages againe by meanes of this Piffuthnes that stale them awaye, and dyd furnishe them also with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returning against them once more, he founde them not idle, nor amazed at his coming, but resolutely determined to receyue him, and to fight for the D MIANS) as farre from SAMOS as he could: or as Stefimbrotus fayeth, to goe into CYPRVS, E which me thinketh is not true. But what soeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For feigniorie by fea. So there was a great battell fought betwene them, neere the Ile of TRA-

CIA. And Pericles wanne the battell: having with foure and fortie fayle only nobly overcome Horie againe his enemies, which were three score & tenne in number, wherof twenty of them were shippes of the Samia. of warre: And so following his victorie forthwith, he wanne also the porte of Samos, and kept the Same and befreged within their owne cittie: where they were yet to bolde, as they would make falies out many times, and fight before the walles of the cittle. But when there arrived a newe supplie of shippes bringing a greater ayde vnto Pericles: then were they shut vp of all fides. Pericles then taking three fcore gallyes with him, lanched out into the fea, with intent(as some saye) to goe mete certen shippes of the Phoenician's (that came to ayde the Sa-

Melissus (the sonne of Ithagenes, a great philosopher) being at that time generall of the SA-M I ANS: perceyuing that fewe shippes were left behinde at the siege of the cittle and that the generall of captaines also that had the charge of them were no very expert men of warre, persuaded his cittizens to make a falve vpon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANS ouercame: the ATHENIANS were taken prisoners, and they funcke many of their shippes. Nowe they being lordes againe of the fea, dyd furnishe their cittie with all manner of munition for warres, whereof before they had great want. Yet Aristotle writeth that Pericles selfe was once ouercome in a battell by fea by Melistus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be even The orde, the with the ATHENIANS for the injurie they had receyued of them before: dyd brande them in F stampe of the the forehead with the stampe of an owle, the owle being then the stampe of their coyne at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN prisoners before with the stape

A of Samena. This Samena is a kynde of a shippe amongest the Samians, lowe afore, and well samena a layed out in the midde shippe, so that it is excellent good to rise with the waves of the seat kinde of a and is very swifte vnder sayle: and it was so called, bicause the first shippe that was made of shippe. this facion, was made in the Ile of Samos, by the tyranne Polycrates. It is faved that the poet Aristophanes, couertly conveying the stampe of the Samians, speaking merylic in a place. of his comedies fayeth:

The Samians are great learned men. Pericles being aduertifed of the ouerthrowe of his armie, returned presently to the rescue, saying of A-Melissus went to mete him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowen, and driven backe the Semians, into his cittie, where Pericles walled them in round about the cittie, defiring victorie rather by time and charge, then by daunger, and loffe of his fouldiers. But when he fawe that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withholde them: he then deuided his armie into eight companies, whom he made to drawe lots, and that companie that lighted on the white beane, they should be quiet & make good cheere, while the other feuen fought. And they saye that from thence it came; that when any haue made good cheere, & taken pleasure abroade, they doe yet call it awhite daye, bicause of the white beane. Ephorus the historiographer writeth, that it was there, where first of all they beganne to vse engines of warre to plucke down great walles, and that Pericles vsed first this wonderfull invention : & that Artemon an enginer was the first deviser of them, He was caried up and downe in a chayer, to fet forward thefe workes, bicaufe he had a lame

C legge: and for this cause he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verses of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeres before this warre of Samos beganne: & faveth that this Periphoretos was a maruelous tender Artemon Peman, and so foolishly afeard of his owne shadowe, that the most parte of his time he sturred viphoretos a not out of his house, & dyd sit allwayes having two of his men by him, that held a copper tatget ouer his head, for feare least any thing should fall vpon him. And if vpon any occasion, he were driven to goe abroade out of his house: he would be carried in a little bed hanging neere the grounde, & for this cause he was surnamed Periphoretos. At the last, at nine moneths ende the Samians were compelled to yeld. So Pericles tooke the cittie, & rafed their walles to the The Samians grounde: he brought their shippes awaye, and made them paye a maruelous great tribute, doe yeld to D whereof parte he receyued in hande, & the rest payable at a certen time, taking oftages with him for affurance of payment. But Duris the Samian dilateth these matters maruelous pittiefully, burdening the ATHENIAN s, and Pericles felf with vnnatural crueltie! whereof neither Thueydides, nor Ephorus, nor Aristotle him selfe maketh mention. And suer I cannot beleeue it is true that is writte. That he brought the captaines of the gallyes, & the fouldiers them schoes of Samia, into the market place of the cittle of MILETVM: where he made them to be bound falt vnto bordes for the space of tenne dayes, & at the ende of the same, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads passhed in peces; and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crowes, & would not burie them. So Duris being accustomed to ouerreach, & to lye many times in things nothing touching him: seemeth in this place out of all reason to aggravate the calamities of his countrie, only to accuse the ATHENIAMS, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles having wone the cittle of Samos he teturned againg to ATHENS, where he dyd honorably burie the bones of his flaine cittizens in this warre; and him felf(according to their manner & custome) made the funerall oration of for the which he was maruelously esteemed. In suche sorte, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration: the ladies & gentlewomen of the cittie came to falute him & brought him garlads to put vpon his head, as they doe to noble coquerers when they returne from games, where they have wonne the price. But Elpinie's coming to him, fayed. Surely Perieles, thy good Elpinicis. feruice done, deserueth garlands of triumphe; for thou hast lost vs many a good and valliant cittizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOBNICIANS, and with the barbarous people as F my brother Cimon dyd, but for destroying a cittle of our owne nation and kynted Perislesto thele wordes, foftely auniwered Elpinice, with Archilocus verfe; fmyling: ATRADAM AND IN VV ben thou art olde painte not thy felfe. Alene for forthe sole olde woman.

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and stoode muche in his owne conceipt, after he a had subdued the Samians, saying: Agamemnon was tenne yeres taking of a cittle of the barbarous people: and he in nine moneths only had wonne the strongest cittie of the whole nation of Ionia. In deede he had good cause to glorie in his victorie: for truely (if Thucydides reporte be true) his conquest was no lesse doubtfull, then he founde it daungerous. For the Samians had almost bene lordes of the sea, and taken the seigniorie thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the warres of PELOPONNESUS being whotte againe, the Co-RINTHIANS invading thilanders of CORPHY: Pericles dyd persuade the ATHENIANS to fend ayde vnto the CORPHIANS, and to ioyne in league with that Iland, which was of great power by fea, faying that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would have warre with them. The ATHENIANS confented to his motion, to avde those of CORPHY. Whereupon R they fent thither Lacedemonius (Cimons sonne) with tenne gallyes only for a mockery: for all Cimons familie and friendes, were wholy at the LACED & MONIANS denotion. Therefore dyd Pericles cause Lacedamonius to have so sewe shippes delivered him, and further, sent him thither against his will, to the ende that if he dyd no notable exploite in this seruice, that they might then the more justly suspect his good will to the LACED & MONIAN S. Moreouer whilest he lived, he dyd ener what he could, to keepe Cimons children backe from ryfing: bicause that by their names they were no naturall borne ATHENIANS, but straungers, cimis somes. For the one was called Lacedamonius, the other Thessalus, and the third Elius: and the mother to all them three was an Arcadian woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he fent but tenne gallyes only, which was but a sleder ayde for those that had requested them, o and a great matter to them that spake ill of him: he sent thither afterwardes a great number of other gallyes, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were martielous angrie, and went & complained to the counsell of the LACED EMONIANS, where they layed open many grieuous complaints and accufations against the ATHENIANS, and so dyd the MEGARIAN'S allo: alledging that the ATHENIAN'S had forbidden them their hauens, their staples and all trafficke of marchaundise in the territories under their obedience, which was directly against the common lawes, and articles of peace, agreed upon by othe among all the GRECTANS. Moreover the ÆGINETES finding them selves very ill and cruelly handled dyd fend fecretly to make their mone & complaintes to the LACED & MONIAN s, being afeard openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While these things were a doing, the cittle of Po-D TID # A fubicct at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in olde time by the CORIN-THIANS) dyd rebell, and was befieged by the ATHENIANS, which dyd haften on the warres. Notwithstanding this, ambassadours were first sent vnto ATHENS vpon these complaints, & Wirehidamus, king of the LAGED EMONIANS, dyd all that he could to pacific the most parte of these quarrells and complaints, intreating their friendes and allies. So as the ATHENIANS Had had no warres at all, for any other matters wherewith they were burdened, if they would have graunted to have revoked the decree they had made against the Megarians. Where upon, Peristes, that aboue all other flood most against the reuocation of that decree, & thandyl Sturre vp the people, & made the to stand to that they had once decreed, & ordered, again the Pericles, at MEGARIANSIWas thought the only original cause & author of the PELOPONNESIAN WARTES, E

For it is fayed that the LACED & HONIANS fent ambaffadours vnto ATHENS for that matter wares against only. And when Pericles alledged a lawe, that dyd forbid them to take away the table, wherest

pon before time had bene written any comon law or edict: Polyarees, one of the LACED E MON ambaffadonts; faved vnto him. Well, faid he, take it not awaye then, but turne the table onely. your lawe I am fuer forbiddeth not that. This was pleasauntly spoken of the ambassadour, but Perioles could never be brought to it for all that. And therefore it feemeth he had forme feeta occasion of grudge against the Magarians yet as one that would finely conucy it ynder the como cause & cloke, he tooke fro them the holy lads they were breaking vp. For to bring this to paffe, he made an order, that they should fend an herauld to luminone the M & G W R & A N S TO let the land alone, & that the same herauld should goe also vinto the LACED & MONTANS TO BE-F cuse the MEGARIANS vnto the Leis true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as also it was most just & reasonable: but it fortuned so, that the messenger they sent thither dyed

A and not without suspition that the MEGARIANS made him awaye. Wherefore Charinus made a lawe presently against the MEGARIANS: that they should be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And also if any MEGARIAN should once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he should suffer the paynes of death. And moreouer, that their captaines taking yerely their ordinary othe, should sweare among other articles, that twife in the yere they should goe with their power. and destroy some parte of the MEGARIANS lande. And lastly, that the heraulde Anthemocritis should be buried by the place called then the gates Thrialienes, and nowe called, Diorlon. But the MEGARIAN's stowtely denying, that they were any cause of the death of this Anthemocritus: dyd altogether burden Albasia and Pericles with the same, alledging for B proofe thereof, Aristophanes verses the Poet, in his comedie he intituled the Acharnes, which

The young men of our lande(to dronken bybbing bent) ranne out one dave unrulily and touvards Megara vuent. From vuhence in their outrage, by force they tooke avvaye, Simatha noble curtifan, as she dyd sporte and playe. Wherewith enraged all (with pepper in the no[e) the provude Megarians came to us, as to their mortall foes, And tooke by stelthe avvaye, of harlots eke a payer, attending on Apalia, which were both young and fayer.

But in very deede, to tell the originall cause of this warre, and to deliuer the trothe thereof it is very harde. But all the historiographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefest author of the warre: bicause the decree made against the M B G A R I A N s, was not reuoked backe againe. Yet some holde opinion, that Pericles dyd it of a noble minde and judgement, to be constant in that he thought most expedient. For he judged that this commaundement of the LACED EMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would graunte them: and if they yelded to them in that, then they manifestly shewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarilie faye, that it was done of a felfe will and arrogancie, to shewe his authoritie and power, and howe he dyd despise the LACEDEMONIANS. But the shrowdest profe of all, that bringeth best authoritie with it, is reported after this sorte . Phidias the image Phidias the

D maker (as we have tolde you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being image maker.

Pericles friende, was in great estimation about him. But that procured him many ill willers. Then they being defirous to heare by him what the people would judge of Pericles: they intifed Menon, one of the worke menthat wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to praye assurance of the people that he might openly accuse Phidias, for a faulte he had committed about Pallas image. The people receyued his obedience, and his accusation was heard opely in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all: bicause that Phidias (through Pericles counsell & deuise) had from the beginning so layed on the gold vpon the image, that it might be taken of, & wayed euery whitte. Whereupo Perislesopenly fayed vnto his accusers, take of the golde & way it. The glorie of his works dyd pur E chase him this enuie. For he having grave vpon the scutchio of the goddesse, the battel of the AMAZONES, had cut out the portraiture of him felf maruelous lively, vnder the persone of an oldebalde man, lifting vp a great stone with both his handes. Further he had cut out Pericles image, excelletly wrought & artificially, seeming in maner to be Pericles self, fighting with an A-MAZON in this forte. The AMAZONES had being lifte up highe, holdeth a darte before Perisles face, so passing cunning syrrought, as it seemed to shadowe the likenes & resemblaunce of Pericles: and yet notwithstanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles self on either side of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in prisone, & there dyed of a sicknes, or els of poyson (as some faye) which his enemies had prepared for him: & all to bring Pericles into further fulpition, & to geue them the more cause to accuse him. But howsoeuer it was, the people gaue Menon his

F freedome, & fet him free for paymet of all fublidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captaines charge they should see him safely kept, and that he tooke no hurte. And about Appliances the fame time also Apassa was accused, that she dyd not believe in the goddes and her ac. A cufer was Hermippus, maker of the comedies. He burdened her further, that the was a bawde to Pericles, and recevued cittizens wives into her house, which Pericles kept . And Diopithes at the fame time made a decree, that they should make searche and enquire for heretickes that dyd not beleeue in the goddes, and that taught certaine newe doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things aboue in the element, turning the fuspition vpon Pericles, bicause of Anaxagoras. The people dyd receyue and confirme this inquifition: and it was moved also then by Dracontides, that Pericles should deliuer an accompt of the money he had spent, vnto Prytamisrea- the handes of the Prytames, who were treasorers of the common fines and reuenues, and that the judges deputed to getre judgement, should gette sentence within the cittle vpon the altar. But Agnon but that worde out of the decree, and placed in flead thereof, that the cause B should be judged by the fifteene hundred judges, as they thought good, if any man brought this action for thefte, for batterie, or for iniustice. As for Apasia, he saued her, even for the verie pittie and compassion the judges tooke of him, for the teares he shed in making his humble fute for her, all the time he pleaded her case: as Æschines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not doe fo muche for him: he fent him out of the cittie, and him felfe dyd accompany him. And furthermore, feeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias facte, and for this cause fearing the issue of the judgement : he set the warres a fyre againe, that allwayes went backeward, and dyd but fmoke a litle, hoping by this meanes to weare out the accusations against him, and to roote out the malice some dyd beare him. For the people having waightie matters in hande, and very daungerous also: he knewe they C would put all into his handes alone, he having wonne already fuche great authoritie and reputation among them. And these be the causes why he would not (as it is sayed) suffer the A-THENIANS to yeld vnto the LACED & MONTANS in any thing: howbeit the trothe cannot certenly be known. But the LACED & MONIANS knowing well, that if they could wede out Pericles, and ouerthrowe him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS. they commaunded them they should purge their cittie of cylons rebellion, bicause they knew well enough that Pericles kynne by the mothers fide were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practife fell out contrarie to their hope, and expectation, that were fent to ATHENS for this purpose. For, wening to have brought Pericles into further suspition and displeasure, the cittizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiaunce in him then be-D fore, bicause they sawe his enemies dvd so much seare and hate him. Wherefore, before king Archidamus entred with the armie of the PELOPONNESIANS into the countrie of ATTICA, he tolde the ATHENIANS, that if king Archidamus fortuned to waste and destroye all the countrie about, and should spare his landes and goodes for the olde loue and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to geue his enemies occasion falsely to accuse him: that from thenceforth, he gaue all the landes and tenements he had in the countrie, vnto the common wealthe. So it fortuned, that the LACED EMONIANS with all their friends and confederates, The Laceda- brought a maruelous armie into the countrie of Attica, vnder the leading of king Archidamu: who burning & spoyling all the countries he came alogest, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, were they incamped, supposing the ATHENIANS would neuer suffer them to E approche so neere, but that they would give them battell for the honour and defence of their countrie, and to show that they were no cowardes. But Pericles wisely considered how the daunger was to great to hazard battell, where the losse of the cittle of Athens stoode in perill, seing they were three score thousand sooteme of the Peloponnes ians, & of the Bobo-TIANS together: for so many was their number in the first voyage they made against the A-

THEN I ANS, And as for those that were very desirous to fight, and to put them selues to any hazard, being mad to fee their countrie thus wasted and destroyed before their eyes, Pericles dyd comforte and pacific them with these wordes. That trees being cut and hewen downe dyd comparison 12 spring againe in shorte time: but men being once dead, by no possibilitie could be broughtagaine. Therefore he neuer durst affemble the people in counfell, fearing least he should be in- F diers desser so forced by the multitude, to doe some thing against his will. But as a wife man of a shippe, fight. when he feeth a storme coming on the fea, doth straight geue order to make all things safe in the (hippe, preparing every thing readie to defend the storme, according to his arte and skill. not harkening to the passengers fearefull cries and pittiefull teares, who thinke them selues cast away: euen so dyd Pericles rule all things according to his wisedome, having walled the cittle substancially about, and set good watche in every corner; and passed not for those that were angrie & offended with him, neither would be perfuaded by his friends earnest requests gintreaties, neither cared for his enemies threates nor accufatios against him, nor yet reckoged of all their foolishe scoffing songes they songe of him in the cittie, to his shame and reproche of gouernment, faying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for daftardlines he let the enemies take all, and spoyle what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that Cleon accus most defamed him, and beganne to enter into some prety credit and fauour with the com-B mon people, for that they were angrie, and milliked with Pericles: as appeareth by these slaun-derous verses of Hermippus, which were then abroade:

O King of Satyres thou, who with fuch manly speache of bloudy wwarres and doughty dedes, dost daylie to ws preache: Why art thou novve afraved, to take thy launce in hande. or with thy pike against thy foes corageously to stande? Synce Cleon stow te and fierce, doth daylie thee prouoke. With biting vvordes, with trenchaunt blades, & deadly dawwnting froke.

All these notwithstanding, Pericles was never moved any thing, but with silence dyd paciently beare all injuries and fcoffings of his enemies, and dyd fend for all that a nauie of a

C hundred fayle vnto PELOPONNESVS, whether he would not goe in persone, but kept him self

D fides many finall citties and townes, Pericles felfe also entring into the MEGARIAN'S Countrie by lande, did waste the whole countrie all afore him. So the Peloponnesians receyuing by at home, to keepe the people in quiet: vntill fuch time as the enemies had raifed their campe, and were gone awaye. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angrie Note Proje at this warre: he comforted the poore people againe, with caufing a certen distribution to else politice to be made amongest them of the common treasure, and division also of the landes that were pasifie the got by conquest. For after he had driven all the ÆGINETES out of their countrie, he caused peoples anger. the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongest the cittizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comforte to them in this advertitie, to heare of their enemies hurte and loffe in by the Athefuche manner as it dyd fall out. For their armie that was fent by fea vnto Peloponnesvs, niant. had wasted and destroyed a great parte of the champion countrie there, and had sacked be-

fea afmuche hurte and loffe at the ATHENIAN'S hands, as they before had done by lande vnto the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres fo long with the ATHENIANS, but would fone haue geuen ouer (as Pericles had tolde them before) had not the goddes aboue fecretly hindered mans reason and pollicie. For first of all there came such a sore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke awaye the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force Plague as of the whole cittie besides, Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infected Athen. with this disease, their hartes also were so sharpely bent against Perioles, that the sicknes hauing troubled their braynes, they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the pacient against his E phylitian, or children against their father, even to the hurting of him, at the provocation of his enemies. Who bruted abroade, that the plague came of no cause els, but of the great multitude of the courty men that came into the cittie on heapes, one vpon anothers necke in the harte of the fommer, where they were compelled to lye many together, fmothred vp in little against Peritentes and cabines, remaining there all daye long, cowring downewardes, and doing nothing; die where before they lived in the countrie in a freshe open ayer, and at libertie. And of all this, faye they, Pericles is the only cause, who procuring this warre, hathe pent and shrowded the country men together within the walles of a cittie, employing them to no manner of vie nor feruice, but keeping them like sheepe in a pinnefolde, maketh one to poylon another with the infection of their plague fores ronning vpon them, and geuing them no leaue to chaunge F aver that they might fo muche as take breathe abroade. Pericles to remedy this, and to doe their enemies a litle mischief: armed a hundred and fiftie shippes, and shipped into them a

PERICLES. great number of armed footemen and horsemen also. Hereby he put the cittizens in good A hope, and the enemies in great feare, seeing so great a power. But when he had shipped all his men, and was him felfe also in the admirall ready to hoyse sayle: sodainely there was a great eclypse of the sunne, and the daye was very darke, that all the armie was striken with a maruelous feare, as of fome daungerous and very ill token towardes them. Pericles feeing the mafter of his gallye in a maze withall, not knowing what to doe: cast his cloke ouer the masters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any hurte or no. The mafter aunswered him, he thought it none. Then fayed Perceles against to him. There is no difference betwene this and that, fauing that the bodye which maketh the darknes is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eyes. These things are thus disputed of in the schooles of the philosophers. But Pericles hoving sayle notwithstanding, dyd no notable nor specials B feruice, aunswerable to so great an armie and preparation. For he laying seigevnto the holy Periode hard cittle of EPIDAVRVM, when every man looked they should have taken it, was compelled to rayle his feige for the plague that was fo vehement: that it dyd not only kill the ATHENI ANS them selues, but all other also (were they neuer so sewe) that came to them, or neere their campe. Wherefore perceyuing the ATHENIANS were maruelously offended with him, he dyd what he could to comforte them, and put them in harte againe: but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them. For by the most parte of voyces, they deprined him of his charge of generall, and condemned him in a maruelous great fine & fumme of money, the which those prined of his charge. that tell the least doe write, that it was the summe of fifteene talentes: and those that say hath stong. But his owne private affavers and household causes were in very ill case: both for that the plague had taken awaye many of his friendes and kinsemen from him, as also for that he and his house had continued a long time in disgrace. For Xanthippus (Pericles sonne & heire) being a man of a very ill disposition and nature, and having maried a young woman very prodigall and lauishe of expence, the daughter of Isander, sonne of Epilyeus: he grudged much at his fathers hardnes, who feantly gaue him money, and but litle at a time. Whereupon he fent on a time to one of his fathers friendes in Pericles name, to praye him to lend D him some money, who sent it vnto him. But afterwardes when he came to demaunde it againe, Pericles dyd not only refuse to paye it him, but further, he put him in fute. But this made the young man Xanthippus so angrie with his father, that he spake very ill of him in euery place where he came; and in mockery reported howe his father spent his time when he was at home, and the talke he had with the Sophisters, and the master rethoritians. For a mifchaunce fortuning on a time, at the game of throwing the darte, who should throwe best, that he that threwe, dyd vnfortunately kill one Epitimius a THESSALIAN: Xanthippus went pratling vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole daye disputing with Protagoras the Rethoritian, to know which of the three by lawe and reason should be condemned for this murther. The darte: he that threwe the darte: or the deuiser of that game. Moreouer E Stefimbrotus writeth, that the brute that ranne abroade through the cittie, howe Pericles dyd keepe his wife, was fowen abroade by Xanthippus him felfe. But fo it is, this quarrell & hate betwext the father and the fonne continued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xanthippus dyed in the great plague, and Pericles ownefifter also: moreouer he lost at that time by the plague, the more parte of all his friends and kinfefolkes, and those specially that dyd him greatest pleasure in gouerning of the state. But all this dyd neuer pull down his contenaunce, nor any thing abate the greatnes of his minde, what misfortunes soeuer he had susteined. Neither fawe they him weepe at any time, nor mourne at the funeralles of any of his kinfemen or friendes, but at the death of Paralus, his younger and lawfull begotten fonne: for, the losse of him alone dyd only melt his harte. Yet he dyd striue to showe his naturall constancie, F and to keepe his accustomed modestie. But as he would have put a garland of flowers vpon his head, forowe dyd fo pierce his harte when he fawe his face, that then he burst out in teares,

A and cryed a mayne: which they neuer fawe him doe before, all the dayes of his life. Furthermore the people having proued other captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of judgement and authoritie sufficient, for so great a charge: In the ende, of them selues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counfells, and to the state of a captaine also to take charge of the state. But at that time he kept him felfe close in his house, as one bewayling his late grieuous losse and sorowe. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familliar friendes, persuaded him to shewe him selfe vnto the people; who dyd excuse them selues vnto him, for their ingratitude towardes him. Pericles then raking the government againe vpon him, the first matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to reuoke the statute he had made for base borne children, fearing least his lawfull heires would fayle, and so his house and name should fall to the grounde. But as for that lawe, Alare as A-

thus it stoode. Pericles when he was in his best authoritie, caused a lawe to be made, that they shear for base only (hould be compted cittizens of ATHENS, which were naturall ATHENIANS borne by borne children. father and mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of Egypt having fent a gifte vnto the people of ATHENS, of forty thousand bulhells of corne, to be distributed among the cittizens there: many by occasion of this lawe were accused to be base borne, and specially men of the baser sorte of people, which were not known before, or at the least had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were falsely and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon so it fell out that there were no lesse then fine thousand of them conuicted and folde for flaues: and they that remained as free men, and were judged to be naturall cittizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thousand and fortie persones. Now this was much milliked of the people, that a lawe enacted, and that had bene of fuche force; should by the selfemaker and deniler of the same be againe renoked and called in . Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his house, dyd breake the peoples hardened hartes against him. Who thincking these sorowes smarte, to be punishment enough vnto him for his former plyde, and judging that by goddes divine inflice and permission, this plague and losse fell vpon him, and that his request also was tollerable: they suffered him to enrolle his base borne sonne in the register of the lawfull cittizens of his familie, geuing him his owne name, Pericles. It is the selfsame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by sea, neere vnto the Iles Arginvs es, was put to death by sentence of the Periods the D people, with the other captaines his companios. Now was Pericles at that time infected with post to death. the plague, but not so vehemently as other were, rather more temperatly: & by long space of Peride fick-

And this made his surname to be Olympius (as to fave, diuine or celestiall) which otherwise for him had bene to prowde and arrogant a name, bicause he was of so good and gentle a nature, and sor that in so great libertie he had kept cleane handes & vndefiled: euen as weesteeme the goddes authors of all good, and causers of no ill, and so worthy to gouerne and rule the whole monarchie of the world. Nowe, the troubles the ATHENIANS felt immediatly after Pericles death, made them then lament the losse of so noble a member. For those who vnpaciently dyd brooke his great authoritie while he liued, bicause it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other speakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confesse, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercie, then his was. And C that most hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, dyd then most plainely appeare vnto them, to have bene the manifest ramper and bullwarke of the safetie of their whole state and common weale: suche corruption and vice in gouernment of the state, dyd then fpring vp immediatly after his death, which when he was aliue, he dyd euer suppresse and keepe vnder in suche sorte, that either it dyd not appeare at all, or at the least it came not to that hed and libertie, that fuche faultes were committed, as were vnpossible to be remedied.

as we could collect, and gather of the life of Pericles: it is nowe good time we should proceede to write also of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is fayed the first Fabius, from whom the house and familie of the Fabians dyd descend (being the greatest & noblest houseof all other in ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he gatte of a Nymphe (or as other saye, a woman of the coutrie) by the river of Tyber. And some saye, that the first of this house, were called at the beginning Fodians, bicause they dyd hunte wilde beastes, with pittefalles and ditches For vnto this present the ROMAINE'S call ditches, Fossa: and to digge Fodere. Since that time;

B the two second letters have bene changed, and they have called them Fabians . But how soeuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that house: and among other, there was one of that house called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMAINES for his noble actes dyd furname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whose life we have now Fabius Rulling in hande, was the fourth lineally descended of the same line, and he was surnamed Verrucosus, Fabius Mabicause of a certen birth marke he had vpon one of his lippes, like a litle warte. And he was all ximus called fo furnamed Ouicula, a little lamme, for his foftnes, flownes, and granity of his doings whileft he Vermeofin was a childe. But bicause of nature he was dull, still, and very filent, and that he was seldome feene to playe at any pastime among the boyes, and for that they sawe he was but of slowe capacitie, and hard to learne and conceyue, and withall that the boyes might doe to him what C they would, he was fo lowly to his fellowes, this made men judge that looked not into him, that he would proue a very foole and nigeot. Yet other were of contrarie opinion of him: who confidering more deepely the man, perceyued in his nature a certen fecret constancie & the maiestie of a lyon. But Fabius selfe when he was called to serue the common weale, dyd quickely shewe to the world, that which they tooke for dullnes in him, was his grauitie, which neuer altered for no cause or respect: and that which other judged fearefullnes in him, was very wifedome. And where he shewed him selfe not hastie; nor sodaine in any thing: it was found in him an affured and fetled constancie. Wherefore when he came to consider the great foueraintie of their common weale, and the continuall warres it was in: he dyd vie his bodie to all hardnes, and brought vp him selfe therewithall, that he might be the better able to serve

As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praise of his sonne, who dyed when he came out of his Consulthippe. which is yet extant to be seene. Now as for him, having bene fine times chosen Conful, in his sines Conful. first yere of his Consulthippe, he triumphed over the Ligurians (which be people of the mountaines, and upon the coast of Genva) who being ouerthrowen by him in a great battell. where they had loft many men, they were compelled to goe their waye, & to take the A LPBS for their fuccour, & durst no more appeare vpon the borders of I TA LIE, whereupon they dyd B confine. Hannibal entring I TALY afterwards with a great armie, and having wonne the first battell neere vnto the river of TREBIA: he passed further, and went through THY SCAN, Wafting and diffroying all the countrie as he paffed by. This made Rome quake for feare. Befides they fawe many fignes and tokens, fome common vnto them, as thundering, lightning, & fuch other like: but other also more straunge, neuer seene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certen targets were waxen all bloudie of them felues, & that about the cittle of ANTIVE they found wheate eares, which were all bloudie when they were reaped: that there fell from heaven, burning stones all in a stame of fire: and in the countrie of the PHALERIANS how the element seemed to open, and many litle written scrolles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written these wordes, worde for worde: Mars doth novu handle his vweapons, C But all these signes and wonders dyd nothing appawle nor daunte the boldnes of Caius Flaminius, Conful then: who befides the naturall great corage, & aspiring minde he had to honour. pet was it beyond all reason increased in him, by the wonderfull good successe he had before. For, notwithstanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellowe Conful stoode against his intent: he for all that dyd gene battell to the GAV LBS, in despight of them all, and wanne the victorie. Likewise, though all these signes & wonders in the aver, dyd greatly trouble, and amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabine, for he fawe no apparant cause to be troubled withall. But he understanding the small number of his enemies, and the lacke of money that was among them: gaue counfell, and was of opinion they should paciently forbeare a litle, and not to hazard battell against a man, whose armie hadde bene long D trained in warres, and by many foughten fields was growen valliant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they should fend ayde to their subjects, and other their allies and confederates. as neede required, to keepe their citties still under their obedience: and in the meane season by tract of time, to weare out Hanniballs force and power, which was like strawe fet a fire, that straight geueth forth a blase, and yet hath no substaunce to holde fire long. When Fabius had thus fayed enough to persuade Flaminius, yet it would not sincke into Flaminius heade: for, fayeth he, I will not tarie untill the warres come to Rome gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the cittie, to defend it, and as Camillus dyd, that fought within the cittie selfe in olde time. Whereup on he commaunded his captaines to set out their bandes to the field, and he him felfe tooke his horse backe: which vpon the sodaine, without any cause E was so aleard, and tooke so on with him selfe, that he cast the Consul to the grounde with his heade forward. For all this fall he would not chaunge his minde, but helde on his iorney toward Hannibal, and presented him battell in THVSCAN, by the lake called Thrasimena, which is the lake of Pervsia. This battell was so fiercely fought on both sides, that notwithstanding Thrasmena, there was such a terrible earthquake therewhile that some citties were ouerthrowen and turned topsi turuey, some rivers had their streames turned against their course, and the soote of the mountaines were torne in fonder, and broken open: yet not one of them that were figh-Flaminius the ting, heard any fuch thing at all . Flaminius the Conful felfe was flaine at that battell, after he had in his owne persone done many a valliant acte, and many of the worthiest gentlemen and valliantest souldiers of his armie laye dead about him: the residue being fled, the slaughter F was great, for the bodies flaine were fifteene thousand, and so many prisoners left aliue. After this ouerthrowe, Hannibal made all the fearche he could possible to finde the bodie of FlamiA nius, to burie him honorably, bicause of his valliantnes: but he could neuer be founde amongest the dead bodies, neither was it euer hearde what became of it. Now as touching the first ouerthrowe at TREBIA, neither the generall that wrote it, nor the post that brought the first newes to R OME, tolde the trothe of it as it was, but fayned that the ende was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the best. But of this battell, so sone as the pretor Pomponius had received the newes, he called all the people to counfell, where without difguifing or diffembling at all, he playnely faved thus vnto them. My Lordes, we have lost the battell, our army is ouerthrowen, and the Consul him selfe is slaine in the field: wherefore consider what you have to doe, & prouide for your safety. These wordes spoken to the people, as it had bene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from R the sea, to put them in daunger, dyd so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole cittie for feare: that they were all in a maze, and knewe not what to determine. Yet in the ende they all agreed, that it stoode them you to have a chief magistrate, called in Latin Dietatura, that (hould be a man of corage, and could flowtely vie it without foaring or fearing any persone. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the only man mete to be chosen, as he, whose noble corage and graue behauiour was aunswerable, to the dignitie and soueraintie of the office; and moreouer, that to his grauity and wisedome there was joyned by reasonable age) strength of bodie, and valliantnes with experience. This countell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Diffator, who named Lucius Minutius general Fabius Diof the horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would graunte him he might effator.

And for this cause he dyd persuade them not to be afrayed of their enemies, but to appeale the wrath of the goddes, and to ferue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but dyd confirme their valiancy with true religion and godlines: and befides dyd vtterly take awaye and aswage their feare of their enemies, by geining them certaine hope and affuraunce of the ayde of the goddes.

Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles prophefies perused, which are kept very secret: and The Sibylles therein they founde certaine auncient prophecies and oracles, which spake of the present booker of promisfortunes of the time. But what were conteined therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered to phecia. any persone. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open assembly of the people, made a solemne vowevnto the goddes, that he would facrifice all the profits and fruites that should fall the rabin your next yere, of theepe, of fowes, of milche kyne, and of goates in all the mountaines, champion countrie, rivers, or meadowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of musike, & shewe other fightes in the honour of the goddes, and would bestowe vpon the same the summe of three hundred three & thirtie Sestercians, & three hundred three & thirtie Romaine pence, & Fathird parte ouer. All which fumme reduced into Gracian money, amounteth to foure score three thousand, fine hundred, and source score, and three silver drachmas, & two obolos. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why

FABIVS. 194 he dyd deuide it by three, vales it were to extolle the power of the number of three; bicarle A it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the begin. ning of divers numbers, and conteineth in it felf the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and joyned together. So Fabius having brought the people to hope, and trust to have the ayde and favour of the goddes: made them in the ende the better disposed to live well afterwardes. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the goddes would fend good lucke and prosperitie vnto men, through their valliantnes and wif. dome: dyd straight let forwards ynto Hannibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully refolued to weare out his strength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increase his pouertie by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his Fabing doings people, with the great number of his fouldiers. Fabing camped allwayes in the strong and B against Han- highe places of the mountaines, out of all daunger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemie: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal removed, he followed him straight, and would be allwayes neere him, but neuer forfooke the hilles, neither would be come fo neere him, as that he should be inforced to fight against his will. Yet allwayes he followed the enemie at his tayle, and made him eyer ateard of him, thincking still that he sought to get the vantage, to geue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this forte; he became difliked of every bodye. For every man both in his owne campe, and abroade, fpake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better, then a rancke coward, Hannibal only excepted. But he perceyning his great reache and policie, and foreseeing the manner of C fight, fawe there was no remedy, but by playne force or flight to bring him to the fight for otherwise his delaye would ouerthrowe the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein only consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his fouldiers should fall away, and dye, and his money was scante, and him felfe should growe the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal beganne to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratageames and policies of warre he could imagine; and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to geue his adversarie the falle. For sodainely, he would goe and geue alarom to his campe: by and by againe he would retire. Another time he would remoue his campe, from one place to another, and geue him some aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuise out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fa-] bius, he continued still resolute in his first determination: that delaye of fight was the best waye fo to ouerthrowe him. Howbeit Minutius, generall of his horsemen, dyd trouble him muche. For he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauing of a lustie conerall of the rage, crept into opinion with the fouldiers, by his whotte furie and defire to fight. Which dispised Fawrought muche in them, and so sturred vp their corages, that they mocked Fabius altogether: and called him Hanniballs schoolemaster: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valliant captaine, and worthie ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke highe, and have a prowde opinion of him felfe, mocking Fabius bicause he ever lodged on the hilles, with faying, the Dictator would make them goodly sportes, to see their enemies waste and burne I T A LY before their face. Moreouer , he asked Fabius friendes , who E ther he would in the ende lodge his campe in the skye, that he dyd clyme vp fo highe vpon mountaines, miltrusting the earthe; or els that he was so affrayed, his enemies would finde him out, that he went to hyde him felfe in the clowdes . Fabius friendes made reporte of these leastes, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare fuche reproachefull wordes as were spoken of him . But Fabius aunswered them . If I should yeld to that you counsell me, I should showe my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leaving my determination, for feare of their mockes and spightfull wordes. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull, and lealous, of the welfare and rather of a base minded persone to seeke to please those whom he ought to com-

Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a facke, Fabius that knewe the countrie, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereaboutes, followed him steppe by steppe, and stopped his passage, where he should have come out of the valley, with foure thousand footenen, which he planted there to keepe the straight, and disposed the rest of his armie vpon the hanginges of the hilles, in the most apt and fit places all about . Then with his light horse men he gaue a charge, vpon the rereward of his Hannibal set

Now to force his enemies to come downe from the toppes of the hilles, and to winne them from their strength, he sawe it was vnpossible, and out of all hope. Wherefore, perceyuing his fouldiers both afrayed and discouraged, for that they fawe them selues hemmed in on all sides, without any order to escape: Hannibal determined to deceyue Fabius by a deuise. He caused straight two thousand oxen to be chosen out Hamibals of the heard, which they had taken before in their spoyles, and tyed to their hornes light fratageane, bundells of reedes, and fallowe faggottes, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commaunded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they fawe any fignall or token lift vp in the ayer in the night, they should then straight fet fire on those bundels and bunches, and drive vp the beaftes to the hilles, toward the wayes where the enemies laye.

Whilest these things were a preparing, he on the other side ranged his armie in order of battell: and when night came, caused them to marche fayer and softely. Now these beastes, whileft the fyre was but litle that burnt vpon their hornes, went but faver and foftly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driven. In fo muche as the heard men that were on the toppe of the mountaines, wondred marueloufly to fee fuche flames and fires about the hornes of fo many beaftes, as if it had bene an armie marching in order of battell with lightes and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the flumpes, and that the force of the fyre dyd five their very fleshe: then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to shake their heades, wherby they dyd fet one another a fyre. Then left they their foste pace, & went no more in order as they dyd before, but for the extreme payne E they felt, beganne to runne here and there in the mountaines, carying fyre still about their hornes, and in their tayles, and fet fyre of all the boughes and coppelies they passed by. This was a strainge fight to looke you, and dyd muche amase the Romaines that kept the passages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne here and there with torches in their handes. Whereupon they were in a maruelous feare and trouble, fuppoling they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuironne them of all fides: fo as they durft no more keepe the paffages which they were commaunded but forfaking the straightes, beganne to flye towards their mayne and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horse men immediatly possessed the straights that were kept: by reason whereof, all the rest of his armie matched out at their case and levsure, without seare or daunger, not-F withfranding that they were loden and troubled with maruelous great spoyles, and of all kynde of fortes. Fabius then perceyued very well the same night, that it was but a slight of Hannibal: for some of the oxen that fled here and there fell ypon his armie. Whereupon ly bicause he was Minutius kinteman (generall of the horsemen) and thought that the ill opi-

196 FABIVS. fearing to fall vpon some ambushe by reason of the darke night, he kept his men in battell a raye, without sturring or making any noise. The next morning by breake of daye, he beganne to followe his enemie by the tracke, and fell vpon the tayle of the rereward, with whom he skirmished within the straites of the mountaines: and so dyd distresse somewhat Hannibale armie. Hannibal thereupon fent out of his vauntgarde a certaine number of Spaniards (very lusty and nymble fellowes, that were yied to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who comming downe, and fetting vpon the ROMAINES that were heavy atmed, flue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they despised Fabius the more, and thought worse of him then they dyd before: bicause his pretence and determination was not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wisedome and policie to ouerthrowe him, where as he him felfe by Hannibal was first finely handled and deceyued, R

Hannibal then to bring Fabius further in difliking and suspition with the Romaines, commaunded his fouldiers when they came neere any of Fabius landes, that they should burne crastines aand destroye all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wife to medle with Fagamft Fabius. bius landes, nor any thing of his, and dyd purposely appointe a garrison to see that nothing of Fabius thould inifcarie, nor yet take hurte. This was straight caried to Rome, which dyd thereby the more incense the people against him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceased crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus speciall procurement and persuation: who of him selfe had no cause to mislike with Fabine, but on-touching the prisoners taken of either side. For it was articled betweene them, that they Fabius chain- should chaunge prisoners, deliuering man for man, or els two hundred and fiftie filuer geth prisoners drachmas for a man, if the one chaunced to have moe prisoners then the other. When exchaunge was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his handes of Ro-MAINE prisoners, two hundred and fortie moe, then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate comaunded there should be no money sent to redeeme them, and greatly founde faulte with Fabius for making this accorde: bicause it was neither honorable, nor profitable for the common weale to redeeme men that cowardly suffered them selues to be taken prisoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderstanding it, dyd paciently beare this displeasure conceyued a-D gainst him by the Senate. Howbeit having no money, and meaning to keepe his worde, and not to leaue the poore cittizens prisoners behinde him: he sent his sonne to Rome, with commission to sell his landes, and to bring him money immediatly. The young man went his waye to ROME, and fold his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the daye amongest the rest, Minutius perceyuing Hannibal had sent a great parte of his armie abroade to forrage and get vittells: came and fet vpon them that remained behinde, and draue them into their campe, with great flaughter, and dyd put them in a maruelous feare that were faued, as men that looked for no leffe, but to have bene befieged in their campe. Afterwardes also, when their whole armie came together againe: he retired backe in spight of them all, and lost not a man. This exploite set Minutius in a pryde, and brought the fouldiers to be more rashe then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrowe went F

Howbeit Minutius litle regarding his commaundementes or requestes, so some as Fabius backe was turned, beganne to be somewhat lustie, and doing with his enemies. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highely magnified Minus by Merelline tim, and commended his corage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlines. the Tribune. but with flat treason. Furthermore, he dyd accuse the Nobilitie and greatest men of Rome, faving: that from the first beginning they had layed a platte to drawe these warres out at length, only to destroye the peoples power and authoritie, having brought the whole common weale, to the state of a monarchy, and into the handes of a prinate persone.

Who by his remissenes and delayes, would geue Hannibal leysure to plante him selse in ITALIE, and by time geue open passage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send R Hannibal a second avde and armie, to make a full conquest of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing these wordes, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried not about the aunswering of the acculations the Tribune had burdened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatche these facrifices and ceremonies of the goddes, that he might spedilie returne againe to the campe to punishe Minutius, for breaking his commaundement, in fighting with the enemie. He had no foner spoken these wordes, but there rose a maruelous tumulte and hurly burley presently among the people, for the daunger Minutius stoode in then : bicause the Dictator had absolute power and authoritie to imprisone and put to death, whom he thought good, without ordinary course of lawe or araynement. Moreouer, they dyd judge, since Fabius had alate left his accustomed mildnes and affabilitie, that he would growe to such severitie in his C anger that it would be a hard thing to appeale him. Wherefore every man held their peace for feare, fauing only Metellus the Tribune. He having authoritie by vertue of his office, to fave what he thought good, and who only of all other kept still his place and authoritie, when any Dictator was chosen: then all the officers that were put down, instantly belought the people not to forfake Minutius, nor to fuffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus dyd alate to his sonne, who strake of his head, after he had valliantly fought with his enemies and of Mentius ourcomed them, for breaking his commaundement. And beganne to persuade them further, Torquesus 10 to take this tyranicall power of the Dictatorshippe from Fabius: and to put their affayers in his some afto the handes of him, that would and could tell howe to bring them fafely to passe. The people were tickled marueloufly with these seditious wordes, but yet they durit not force Fabius D to refigne his Dictator(hippe, though they bare him great grudge, and were angrie with him in their hartes. Howbeit they ordeined that Minutius thenceforth should have equall power The Diffusor and authoritie with the Dictator in the warres, a thing that was never seene nor heard of before, and yet the very fame done in that forte againe, after the battell of Cannes . For Marcus men made e-Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they dyd choose another Dictator at Rome, quall in au-which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create newe Senators in the place of those that were flaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and restored the full number agains of the counfell of the Senate : he discharged the selfe same daye the sergeants that carried the axes before him, and fent awaye the traine that waited upon him, and dyd fo put him felfein prease of the people in the market place, and followed his owne peculiar busines as a private per-E sone. Nowethe ROMARNES imagined, that when Fabius should see howethey had made

Minutius equal in authoritie with him, it would greue him to the harte for very anger: but they came shorte to judge of his nature, for he dyd not thincke that their folly should hurte or diffeonour him at all. But as wife Diogenes aunswered one that fayed vnto him, looke, Diogenes hurte before he came to the campe: he departed fodainely out of Rome without any mans a knowledge, to returne agains to the cape, where he found Minutine fo prowde & flower, that he was not to be delt with. For he would nedes have the authoritie to commaund the whole armie when it came to his turne . But Fabius would not confent to that , but deuided the one halfe of the armie betweene them : thincking it better he should alone commaunde the one halfe, then the whole army by turnes. So he chose for him selfe, the first and third legion; and gaue vnto him, the seconde and fourth, & deuided also between them the ayde of their friends. And when Minutius made his boafte, that the maiestie of the highest magistrate was brought lower for his fake: Fabius tolde him that he might thincke, if he were wife, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would nedes contend against his companion, yet he should have a speciall regard and consideration, that having wonne nowe the cittizens good R willes, by whom he was so much honoured, he should have no lesse care of their healthe and fafety, then he had, who was nowe troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them . Minutus tooke his leffon, for a counterfeate mocke, after olde mens manners & facion: & fo taking the one half of the armie vnto him, went and lodged alone by him felf. Hannibal hearing of their iarre and squaring together, sought straight oportunitie to make their discord finely to serue his turne. Nowe there was a hill between both their campes not very harde to be wonne, and it was an excellent place to lodge a campe fafely in, and was very fitte and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, dyd feeme a farre of to be very playne & euen ground. bicause they had no couert of wodde to shadowe them, yet were there many ditches and litle vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might eafely have taken it at his pleasure if he C had lifted dyd let it alone in the middeft betwene them, for a bayte to drawe out his enemies to the battell. Nowe when Hannibal fawe Fabius and Minutius lodged a fonder, he placed cerlayed ambulh taine bandes in the night, among those ditches and valleyes. Afterwardes the next morning pollicie to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out in deede. For first Minutius sent this

The fight continued equall a good space betwene them both vntill fuch time as Hannibal faw his enemie come directly within his daun- D ger, and shewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had laved in ambushe: he straight raised the signall he had geuen them. They ypon that discouered all together, and with great cries dyd fet vpon the rereward of the Romaines, & flue a great number of them at the first charge: and dyd put the reste in suche a feare and disorder, as it is vnpossible to expresse it. Then was Minutius rashe brauerie and fonde boastes muche cooled. when he looked first vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and sawe in none of their any co-rage to tarie by it, but rather that they were all readie to ronne away. Which if they had done they had bene cast awaye every man: for the Numidians finding they were the stronger dyd disperse themselves all about the plaine, killing all stragglers that fled . Mimie justouldiers being brought to this daunger and diffresse, which Fabius foresawe they would fall into, and E Fabius forefight in the having vpon this occasion his armie readie ranged in order of battell, to see what would be come of Minutius, not by reporte of mellengers, but with his owne eyes: he got him to 2 litle hill before his campe, where when he fawe Minutius and all his men compaffed about on euery fide, & euen staggering & ready to flye, & heard besides their cries not like menthat had hartes to fight, but as men scared, and ready to flye for feare to saue them selves he claps ped his hande on his thighe, and fetched a great fighe, faying to those that were about him. O goddes, howe Minutius is gone to cast him selfe awaye, soner then I looked for, and later then he defired? But in speaking these wordes, he made his ensignes marche on in haste, crying out alowde. O my friends, we must dispatche with speede to succour Minutius; for he is a valliat man of persone, & one that loueth the honour of his countrie. And though with ouer F much hardines he hath ventted to farre, & made a faulte, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time serueth not now to accuse him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he presently brake

Afterwardes he went further, and dvd fet voon them that had cuesh Minus they thought would have ned. Afterwardes he went lattitles, and dyd not voors them that had sing, generall general charge vpon the rereward of Minutius battell, where he flue them that made head a of the horsegainst him. ROMAINES vnto: before they were enuironned in of all fides, dyd turne taile ftraight to Fahius Now Hannibal feeing this chaunge, and confidering howe Fabius in perfore, with more corage then his age required, dyd make a lane in the middest of those that fought against the fide of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was the made the battell to cease, and commaunded to founde the retreate, and fo drue backe his men againe into his campe, the ROMAINES being very glad also they might retire with fafetie. My friends, not to erre at all, enterprifing great matters, it is a thing passing mans na Minutes ture: but to take warning hereafter, by faultes that are paste and done, it is the parte of a wife ration to his and valliant man. Afterwards enery man being filent, Minutius beganne alowde to fave vnto him My lorde Destator, this Minutius daye you have wonne two victories. And haning looken these wordes, he embraced Fabius: and so dyd the souldiers also, hartely embrace tobether, and kiffe one another. Thus the love was great through the whole campe, and one were fo glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their chekes for great love Nowe when the bius was afterwardes put out of his office of Dictator hippe, there were new Confuls chofen againe: the two first followed directly Fabins former order he had begone. For they kept their felues from geuing Hannibal any battell, and dyd allwayes fend ayde to their libiects and friends, to keepe them from rebellion : vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth; and Theraffines knowen to be very bold and rashe) by flattering of the people, wanne credit among them to F be made Conful. Then they thought that he by his rashnes and lacke of experience, would rathing incontinently hazard battell: bicause he had cried out in all the assemblies before, that this warre would be euerlasting so long as the people dyd chuse any of the Fabians to be their ge- confidence neralles, and vawnted him selfe openly, that the first daye he came to see his enemies, he would a ouerthrowe them. In geuing out these braue wordes, he assembled such a power, that the Ro-MAINES neuer fawe fo great a number together, against any enemie that euer they had : for he put into one campe foure score and eight thousand fighting men. This made Fabius and the nes cape un- other Romaines, men of great wifedome and judgement, greatly affrayed : bicause they sawe no hope for Rome to rife againe, if it fortuned that they should lose so great a number of goodly youth . Therefore Fabius talked with the other Conful, called Paulus Amilius, a man very skilfull and expert in warres, but ill beloued of the common people, whose furie he yet feared for that they had condemned him a litle before to paye a greatfine to the treasurie; and after he had formwhat comforted him, he beganne to perfuade and encorage him to reful the fonde rashnes of his companion, telling him, that he should have asmuch to doe with Teren.

tius Varro for the preservation and safety of his countrie, as to fight with Hannibal for defence of the same. For they were both Marshall men, and had a like desire to fight: the one bicause he knewe not wherein the vantage of his strength consisted, and the other bicause he knewe very well his weaknes. You shall have reason to beleeue me better, for matters touching Hannibal, then Terentius Varro. For I dare warrant you, if you keepe Hannibal from battell but this yere: he shall of necessitie, if he tarie, consume him self, or els for shame be driven to five with his armie. And the rather bicause hetherto (though he seeme to be lorde of the field) never one yet of his enemies came to take his parte: and moreouer bicause there remaines at this daye in his campe not the third parte of his armie, he brought with him out of his countrie. Vnto these persuasions, the Consul (as it is reported) aunswered thus. When I looke into my felfe, my lorde Fabius, me thinkes my best waye were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once againe to light into the hands & voyces of our cittizens. Therefore, fith the estate of the common wealth so requireth it, that it behoueth a man to doe as you have sayed: I will doe my best indeuour to shewe my selfe a wise captaine, for your sake only, rather then for all other that should aduise me to the cotrarie. And so Paulus departed from Rome with this minde. But Terentius his companion would in any case, they should comaund the whole armie by turnes, eche his daye by him felfe: and went to encampe harde by Hannibal, by the river of Aufide, neere vnto the village called CANNES. Nowe when it came to his daye to comaund by turnes, early in the mourning he caused the signall of battell to be set out, which was a coate armour of skarlet in graine, that they dyd laye out vpon the paulion of the ge- I nerall: fo that the enemies at the first fight, begane to be afeard, to see the lustines of this newe come generall, and the great number of fouldiers he had also in his hoste, in comparison of them that were not halfe so many. Yet Hannibal of a good corage, commaunded euery man go arme, and to put them selves in order of battell : and him selse in the meane time taking his horse backe, followed with a fewe, gallopped vp to the toppe of a litle hill not very steepe. from whence he might plainely discerne all the ROMAINES campe, and sawe howe they dyd range their men in order of battell. Nowe one Gifcon (a man of like state and nobilitie as him felfe) being with him at that time, tolde him, that the enemies feemed a farre of to be a mat-

What? mary fayeth he this; that of all the great number of fouldiers you fee yonder, there is not a man of them called Gifcon as you are. This mery aunswer deliuered contrarie to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great waightie matter, made them all laughe a good. So downe the hill they came laughing alowde, and tolde this prety leaste to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ranne ouer all the campe, in to much as Hannibal him felfe could not holde from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN fouldiers perceyuing this, beganne to be of a good corage, imagining that their generall would not be to merylie disposed as to fall a laughing, being so neere daunger, if he had not perceyued him selfe a great deale to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore he shewed two policies of a skilfull captaine in the battell. The r first was, the situation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, so as they had the winde on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raifed a sharpe dust our of uelous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forehead, aunswered him. Yea, sayed he, but there is another thing more to be wondered at then you thinke of Gifcon Gifcon straight asked him:

A the open fandy valley, and paffing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS fquadron, blewe full in the Ro-

MAINES faces, with fuch a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne rankes. The seconde policie was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either fide of his winges, the best and valliantest souldiers he had in all his armie: and Hamnibations dyd fill vp the middest of his battell with the worste of his men, which he made like a pointe, at Cannes.

and was farder out by a great deale, then the two winges of the fronte of his battell. So he commaunded those of the winges, that when the ROMAINES had broken his first fronte, and followed those that gaue backe, whereby the middest of his battell should leave an hollowe place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compasse of the two winges:

that then they should fet vpon them on both sides, and charge their flanks immediatly, and so B inclose them in behind. And this was cause of a greater slaughter. For when the midle battell beganne to geue backe, and to receyue the Romaines within it, who pursued the other very whotly, Hannibals battell chaunged her forme: & where at the beginning it was like a pointe. ir became nowe in the middest like a cressant or halfe moone. Then the captaines of the chosen bandes that laye out in both the winges, made their men to turne, some on the left hand, and some on the right, and charged the ROMAINES on the flankes, and behinde, where they The flaughand folice on the right, and charged the Rould not faue them selues by flying, before they ter of the Re-were enuironned. They faye also, that there fell out another mischief by misfortune, vnto the battell of horsemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occasion. The horse of Paulus Amilius the Consul Cannes. being hurte, dyd throwe his master on the grounde: whereupon those that were next him, dyd light from their horse backs to helpe him. The residue of the horsemen that were a great wave behinde him, seeing them light, thought they had bene all commaunded to light: hereupon euery man forfooke their horfe, and fought it out a foote. Hannibal when he fawe that, faved : yea marie, I had rather have them fo, then delivered me bounde hande and foote . But for those matters, the historiographers doe dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Cofuls, Varro faued him felfe by his horse, with a fewe following him, within the cittie of V E-NVS.A. Paulus being in the middest of the throng of all the armie, his bodie full of arrowes Paulus AEthat stucke fast in his woundes, and his harte sore loden with grieuous sorowe and anguishe at the bastell to fee the ouerthrowe of his men: was fet downe by a rocke, looking for fome of his enemies, of cannes. to come and ryd him out of his payne. But fewe could knowe him, his head and face was of) fuch a gore bloude: infomuch as his friends and feruants also passed by him, and knewe him not. And there was but one young gentleman of a noble house of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knewe him, who dyd his best endeuour to saue him . For he lighted a foote presently, & brought him his horse, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could saue him selfe for the necessitie of his countrie, which nowe more then euer had neede of a good and wife captaine. But he refused the gentlemans offer and his intreatie, and compelled him to take his horse backe againe, though the teares ranne downe his chekes for pittie: and raifing him felfe vp to take him by the hande, he fayed vnto him. I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, and witnesse with me, that Paulus Æmilius even to his last hower hath followed his counfaill, and dyd neuer swarue from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced E to it by Varro, and afterwardes by Hannibal. When he had deliuered these wordes, he bad Lentulus farewell: and ronning againe into the furie of the flaughter, there he dyed among his flaine companions. It is thought there were flaine at this battell, fiftie thousand ROMAINES, & 50000. Ro-

For the most parte of the coutrie, dyd yeld immediatly vnto him: as the cittle of Ca-PVA, being the chiefest and greatest cittie of all ITALIE but Rome, and dyd receyue Hannibal. and were at his denotion. Thus we maye plainely fee, that as the poet Euripides fayeth: it is a great mischief not onely to be driven to make triall of friendes, but proofe also of captaines wisdom. For that which before they accompted cowardlines and fainte harte in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reason, and rather a heauenly wisdome and influence, that so long foresawe the things to come, which the parties selues that h afterwards felt them, gaue litle credit vnto before. Vpon this occasion, Rome reposed incontinently all their hope and truste in Fabius, and they repaired to him for consell, as they would haue ronne vnto some temple or altar for sanctuarie. So as the first & chiefest cause of staying the people together from difperfing them felues abroade, as they dyd when Rome was taken by the GAVLES: was the only opinion & confidence they had in Fabrus wisedome. For where before he seemed to be a coward, and timerous, when there was no daunger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for forowe, which could not helpe, and that were magistrates, and he alone was the only force and power of the cittie: for there was that all the world was fo troubled that there was no order taken for anything, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the cittie very modeftly, with a bold constant countenaunce, speaking curteoufly to enery one, and dyd appeale their womanithe cries and lamentations, and C dyd forbid the common affemblies & fonde ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corfe at their burialls. Then he perfuaded the Senate to affemble in counfell, and dyd comforte vp those going their wave, that would have for faken the cittie. He moreouer dyd appointe the time Fabius order and place of mourning, & dyd commaund who foeuer was difposed to mourne, that he should for mounting. doe it privately in his owne house, and to continue only but thirtie dayes. Then he willed all mourning to be left of, and that the cittie might be cleane from such vncleane things. So the feast of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leave of the facrifices & pro-D ceffion they were wont to keepe on Ceres daye: then by their fmall number that were left, and forowe of those that remained, to let their enemies vnderstand their exceeding great losse. For the goddes delite to be served with glad and rejoycing hartes, and with those that are in prosperitie. But all this notwithstanding, whatsoeuer the priestes would have done, either to pacifie the wrath of the goddes, or to turne awaye the threatnings of these sinister signes, it was forthwith done. For they dyd fendeto the oracle of Apollo, in the cittle of DELPHES, one of Fabius kinsemen surnamed Pictor. And two of the Vestall Nunnes being deflowred: the one was buried aliue according to the lawe and custome, and the other made her self awaye. But here-The magna- in the great corage and noble elemency of the ROMAINES, is maruelously to be noted and regarded. For the Conful Terentius Varro returning backe to Rome, with the shame of his ex- E treme misfortune & ouerthrowe, that he durste not looke vpon anyman: the Senate not withstanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the cittie to meete him, and dyd honorably receyue him. Nay furthermore, those that were the chief magistrates and Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when filence was made, they commended Varro much: bicause he did not despaire of the prescruation of the common weale after so great a calamitie, but dyd returne againe to the cittie, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vfing the authoritie of the lawe, and the service of the cittizens, as not being altogether under foote, but standing yet in reasonable termes of good recouery. But when they understoode that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other partes of ITALTE: then they beganne to be of good chere againe, and fent a newe armie and generalles to the field, among which, the two chief generals F were, Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in manner, wanne a like glorie and reputation. For Marcellus (as we have declared in his life) was a man

A of freedy execution, of a quicke hande, of a valliant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homes calleth them, that valliantly put them felues in any daunger: by reason whereof, having to deale with another captaine a like venturous and valliant as him felfe, in all feruice and execution, he shewed the selfe boldnes and corage that Hannibal dyd. Bur Fabius persisting still voon his first determination, dyd hope that though he dyd not fight with Hannibal, nor sturre him at all, yet continuall warres would confume him and his armie in the end, and bring them both to nought: as a commo wrestler that forceth his bodie aboue his naturall strength doth in the ende become a lame and broofed man. Hereupon Posidonius writeth, that the one was Posidonius called the Romaines fworde, and the other their target. And that Fabius constancie and re-folutnes in warres to fight with securitie, and to commit nothing to hazard & daunger, being cellus. mingled with Marcellus heate and furie: was that only, which preserved the Romaines empire. For Hannibal meting allwayes in his waye the one that was furious, as a strong ronning ftreame, founde that his army was continually turmoyled and ouerharried: & the other that was flowe as a little prety river, he founde that his army ranne foftely vnder him without any novse, but yet continually by litle and litle it dyd still consume & diminishe him, vntill he sawe him selfe at the last brought to that passe, that he was weary with fighting with Marcellus, and affrayed of Fabius bicause he fought not. For during all the time of these warres he had euer these two captaines almost against him, which were made either Prætors, Consuls, or Proconfuls: for either of them both had bene fine times before chosen Conful. Yet as for Marcellus: Hannibal had layed an ambushe for him in the fifte and last vere of his Conful-C (hippe, where he fet ypon him on a fodaine; and flue him. But as for Fabius, he layed many flaine by an mie, & to have gone to them. But bicause the signes of the birdes dyd promise him no good him falle yoon his ambushe he had layed for him; and by this policie. He had counterfeated letters written and sent vnto him from the cittle of METAPONT, to praye him to come to Hamibals them, and they would deliuer their cittie into his handes: and withall, that fuch as were privile ambuff layer

Furthermore, concerning the revolte of the citties that were fubicct vnto them, and the rifing of their allies & friends against them: Fabius thought it farre better to intreate them curreously. Fabius lenitie making them ashamed without occasion to rebell against them, rather then openly to suspect in corresing them, and to deale straightly with those that were so to be suspected. Now for this matter, it of faulter. is reported that Fabius had a fouldier in his campe that was a MARSIAN borne by nation, a the enemie. Fabius hearing of this practife he went about, gaue him no ill countenaunce for Note how Feit, but calling him to him, he fayed. I must confesse there is no reckoning made of your as your bim reclai-

But henceforth it shalbe your owne faulte if you doe not declare your minde vnto me. and betweene you and me make me privie of your lacke & necessitie. When he halt spoken these wordes to him, he gaue him a very good horse for service, and dyd rewarde him with other honorable giftes, as men of good feruice & defert have commonly bestowed on them: and this dyd so encorage the souldier thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and ser-F uiceable fouldier to the ROMAINES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horses, & such like as take your them to tame brute beastes, should somer make them leave their fauage & churlishe nature, by gentle vsage and manning of them: then by beating, and shackling of them. And so a governour of men, should rather correct his souldier by paciece. gentlenes, and clemency: then by rigour, violence, or feueritie. Otherwise he should handle them more rudely, and sharpely, then husbandmen doe figge trees, oliue trees, & wilde pome garnets: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, doe alter their harde and wilde nature, & cause them in the end to bring forth good figges, oliues & pomegarnets. Another time certaine captaines of his brought him worde, that there was one of their fouldiers which would euer goe out of the cape, & leave his enligne. He asked them, what manner of man he was . They aunswered him all together , that he was a very good souldier, and that they could hardly finde out fuche another, in all their bandes as he: and therewithall they tolde him, of fome notable service they had seene him doe in persone. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquierie to know what the cause was that made him goe so oft out of the campe in the end. R he founde he was in loue with a young woman, and that to goe fee her, was the cause he dyd fo ofte leave his enfigne, and dyd put his life in fo great daunger, for that the was fo farre of. When Fabius vnderstoode this, he sent certaine souldiers (vnknowing to the souldier) to bring the woman awaye he loued, and willed them to hyde her in his tente: and then called he the fouldier to him, that was a Lycanian borne, and taking him a fide, fayed vnto him thus. My friend, it hath bene tolde me, how thou hast lyen many nightes out of the campe, against the lawe of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therewithall I understande also that otherwife thou art an honest man, and therefore I pardone thy faultes paste, in consideration of thy good feruice: but from henceforth I will geue thee in custodie to such a one, as shall make me accompt of thee. The fouldier was blancke, when he heard these wordes. Fabius with that, C caused the woman he was in loue with, to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, faying vnto him. This woman hereafter shall aunswer me thy bodie to be forth comming in the campe amongest vs: and from henceforth thy deedes shall witnesse for the reste, that thy loue vnto this woman, maye be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practife or intent. Thus much we finde written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after suche a sorte, recouered againe the cittie of TARENTVM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had loft by treason. It fortuned there was a young man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a fifter within TARENTYM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruelous dearely: now there was a captaine, a Brytian borne, that fell in loue with her, and was one of those to whom Hannibal had committed the charge of the D cittie of TARENTYM. This gaue the young fouldier the TARENTINE, very good hope, and waye, to bring his enterprise to good effect: whereupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his privite fled from his campe, and got into the cittle of TARENTVM, geuing it out in the cittie, that he would altogether dwell with his fifter. Now for a fewe dayes at his first comming the BRYTIAN captaine laye alone by him felfe, at the request of the mayde his fifter. who thought her brother had not knowen of her loue; and shortely after the young fellowe tooke his fifter aside, and sayed vnto her. My good sister, there was a great speache in the Ro-MAINES campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefest captaines of the garrison: I prave thee if it be so, let me knowe what he is. For so he be a good fellowe, and an honest man (as they faye he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all things topfi turney, regardeth not of E what place or calling he is of, and still maketh vertue of necessitie, without respect of shame. And it is a speciall good fortune, at such time as neither right nor reason rules, to happen yet into the handes of a good and gratious lorde. His fifter hearing him speake these wordes, sent for the BRYTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeuoured him felf to frame his fifters loue in better forte towards him, then it was before: by reason whereof, the captaine also beganne to trust him very muche. So this young TARENTINE sawe it was very easie, to winne and turne the minde of this amarous and mercenarie man, with hope of great giftes that were promifed him, and Fabius should performe. Thus doe the most parte of writers set downe this storie. Howbeit some writers saye, that this woman who wanne the BRYTIAN captaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRYTIAN F borne, whom Fabius it is fayed, kept afterwards for his concubine: and that the vnderstanding the captaine of the BRYTIANS (who laye in garrison within the cittle of TARENTYM) was

A 2162 BRYTIAN borne, and of her owne native countrie: made Fabite privile to her intent. and with his confent, the comming to the walles of the cittie, spake with this BRATIAN CAPraine, whom the handled in fuch forte, that the wanne him. But whileft this geare was a hiew-wonne br a ing, Fabius, bicause he would traine Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote vnto the fouldiers, womans of RHEGIO: which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they should enter the borders of the means. BRYTIANS, and laye seige to the cittle of CAYRONIA, and rase it to the grounde. These RHEGIAN fouldiers were about the number of eight thousand, and the most of them traitours, and ronneagates, from one campe to another; and the worlt forte of them; and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of Siciis, so that in losing them all, the loffe were nothing to the common weale, and the forrowe muche leffe. So Fa-B bigg thought, that putting these fellowes out for a praye to Hannibal (as a stale to drawe him from those quarters) he should plucke him by this meanes from TARENTYM: and so it came. to passe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his armie to intrappe them: and in the meane time Fabius wet to laye feige to TARBNTVM, where he had not lien fix dayes before it. but the young man (who together with his fifter had drawen the BRVTIAN captaine to this treason)stale out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, having taken very good markes of that fide of the walle the BRYTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promifed him to keepe it secret, & to suffer them to enter, that came to assaulte that side. Yet Fabius would not grounde his hope altogether ypon the BRVTIANS executing this treason, but went him self in persone to vewe the place appointed howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: C and in the meane feason, he gave a generall assault to all partes of the cittie (aswell by sea as by lande) with great showtes & cries. Then the BRVTIAN captaine seeing all the cittizens and garrison ronne to that parte, where they perceyued the noyse to be greatest: made a signall vnto Fabius, that now was the time . Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought a pace, Fabius toke whereupon him selfe with his companie scaled the walles, and so wanne the cittie. But it ap- the cittie of peareth here, that ambition ouercame him. For first he commaunded they should kill all the BRYTIANS, bicause it should not be known he had wonne the cittle by treason. But this sion cause of bloudie policie failed him: for he miffed not only of the glorie he looked for , but most defer- fonte murders uedly he had the reproche of crueltie and fallehood. At the taking of this cittie, a maruelous number of the TARENTINES were flaine, besides there were solde thirtie thousand of the D chiefest of them, & all the cittle was facked: and of the spoyle thereof was caried to the commonstore treasure at Rome, three thousand talents. It is reported also, that when they dyd spoyle and carie awaye all other spoyles lefte behinde, the recorder of the cittle asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to doe with the goddes, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius aunswered him. Let vs leave the TARBNT INES their goddes that be angrie with them, This notwithstanding, he caried from thence Hercules statue, that was of a monstruous bignes, and caused it to be set up in the Capitoll, and withall dyd set up his owne image in braffe a horse backe by him. But in that act he shewed him self farre harder harted, then Marcellus had done, or to faye more truely, thereby he made the world knowe how muche Marcellus curtesie, clemencie, and bowntie was to be wondred at : as we have written in his life. Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTVM was belieged, he marched prefently with all speede possible to raise the seige: and they saye he had almost come in time, for he was with in 40, furlonges of the cittie when he vnderftoode the trothe of the taking of it. Then fayed he out alowd, fure the Romaines have their Hannibal to: for as we wanne TARENTVM, so have we lost it. But after that, to his friends he fayed privately (and that was the first time they ever heard him speake it) that he sawe long before, and now appeared plainely, that they could not possibly with this small power keepe ITALIB. Fabius made his triumphe and entrie into ROME the seconde time, by reason of taking of this cittie and his seconde triumphe was Fabius Section muche more honorable then the first, as of a valliant captaine that held out still with Hanni- winnesses. bal, and easely met with all his fine policies, muche like the slight trickes of a cumning F wrestler, which caried not now the former roughenes and strength any more, bicause that great riches they had gotten, and partely also for that it was fore wasted and diminished, his armie was genen to take their ease, and growen to delicacie, partely through the

through the fundrie foughten battells and blowes they had bene at . Now there was one a Martis Livius a Romaine, that was governour of TARENTY Mat that time, when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheles kept the castell still out of Hannibals handes, and to held it vneil the cittle came againe into the handes of the ROMAINES. This Livius ipighted to fee fuche honour done to Fabius, so that one daye in open Senate, being drowned with enuie and ambition, he burst out and sayed: that it was him selfe, not Fabins, that was cause of taking of the cittle of TARENTYM againe. Fabius fmiling to heare him, auniwered him openly:in Fabius winie deede thou fayest true, for if thou haddest not lost it, I had neuer wonne it againe. But the

ROMAINES in all other respects dyd greatly honour Fabrus, and specially for that they choice his some Consul. He having alreadie taken possession of his office, as he was dispatchine certen causes touching the warres, his father (whether it was for debilitie of his age, orto h proue his sonne) tooke his horse to come to him, and rode through the prease of people that thronged about him, having busines with him. But his sonne seeing him comming a farre of, would not fuffer it, but fent an officer of his vnto him, to commaund him to light of his horse, and to come a soote if he had any thing to doe with the Consul. This com-Afternoone of his horfe, and to come a roote it ne mad any times to see all looked vpon Fabius, but to maundement milliked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but come made and they all looked vpon Fabius, but the see and they are the very wronge to his faof the father, fayed not a worde: thinking with them selues, that the Consul dyd great wronge to his fapreferring euer the honour and state of our countrie, aboue father, mother, or children. And truely they fave, that Fabius great grandfather being the greatest and most noble persone of ROME in his time, having five times bene Conful, and had obteined many triumphes, for diuers honorable and fundrie victories he had wonne: was contented after all these, to be his sonnes lieutenaunt, and to goe to the warres with him, he being chosen Consul. And last of all the Consul his sonne returning home to Rome a conquerour, in his triumphing charret drawen with foure horses, he followed him a horse backe also, in troupe with the rest thinking it honour to him, that having authoritie over his sonne in the right of a father, and being also the noblest man of all the cittizens, so taken and reputed, neuertheles he willingly fubmitted him selfe to the lawe and magistrate, who had authoritie of him. Yet besides all I this, he had farre more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then those already spoken of. But it fortuned that this sonne of Fabius died before him, whose death he tooke pacietly, like a wife man, and a good father. Now the custome being at that time, that at the death of obsequies: he him selfe made the same oration in honour of his sonne, and dyd openly speake it in the market place, and moreouer wrote it, and deliuered it out abroade. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was fent into SPAYNE, who draue out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had ouerthrowen them in many battells, and had conquered many great citties, and greately aduaunced the honour and estimation of the state of Rome: for the which at his returne, he was asmuche, or rather more honoured, beloued and esteemed, E Scipio Conful, then any other that was in the cittie of Rome. Hereupon Scipio being made Conful, confidered that the people of Rome looked for some great matter at his handes, about all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight against Hannibal in ITALIE, he should but followe the olde manner, and treade to muche in the steppes of the olde man: whereupon he refolued immediately to make warres in A F R I C K E, and to burne and destroye the countrie euen vnto C ARTHAGE gates, and so to transferre the warres out of I T A L I E into L I B Y A, procuring by all possible deuise he could, to put it into the peoples heades, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarilie, persuading him selse that the enterprise this young rashe youthe tooke in hande, was vtterly to ouerthrowe the common weale, or to put the state of Rome in great daunger: deuised to put Rome F in the greatest feare he could possible, without sparing speache or dede he thought might serue for his purpose, to make the people chaunge from that minde. Now

FABIVS. A he could so cunningly worke his purpose, what with speaking and doing, that he had drawen all the Senate to his opinion. But the people judged, it was the fecret enuiche bare to Scipioes glorie, that drue him to encounter this deuise, only to bleamish Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, least if he should happen to doe some honorable service (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwise to draw Hannibal out of IT ALTE) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bene to fofte, or to negligent, to drawe this warre out to fuche a length. For my parte, me thinkes the only matter that moued Fabius from the beginning to be against Scipio, was the great care he had of the fafetie of the comon weale, by reason of the great danger depending youn fuch a resolution. And yet I doe thinke also, that afterwards he went further then he should, contending to fore against him (whether it was through ambition or obstinacie) R feeking to hinder and suppresse the greatnes of Scipio: considering also he dyd his best to perfuade Crassing, Scipioes companion in the Consultationer, that he should not graunte vnto him the leading of the armie, but if he thought good to goe into A FRICKE, to make warres vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he should rather goe him self. And moreouer, he was the let that they gaue him no money for maintenaunce of these warres. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furnish him felfe as he could: he leavied great fummes of money in the citties of Thyscan, who for the great loue they bare him, made contribution towardes his iorney. And Crassius remained at home, both bicause he was a softe, and no ambitious, nor contentious man of nature : as also, bicause he was the chiefest Prelate and highe bishoppe, craffunhighe who by the lawe of their religion, was constrained to kepe Rome. Fabius seeing his labour lost killoppe of Rome.

C that wave, tooke againe another course to crosse Scipio, deuising to staye the young men at home, that had great defire to goe this iorney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all affemblies of the Senate & people, that Scipio was not contented only to flye Hannibal, but that he would carie with him besides the whole force of I TALY that remained: alluring the youthe with sweete baytes of vaine hope, and persuading them to leaue their wives, their fathers, mothers, and their countrie, euen now when their enemie knocked at Rome gates, who dyd euer conquer, and was yet neuer conquered. These wordes of Fabius dyd so dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio should furnishe his iorney only with the armie that was in Sicilia, fauing that he might supply to them if he would, three hundred of the best souldiers that had served him faithfully in SPAYNE. And so it doth appeare even to this

D present, that Fabius both dyd and sayed all things, according to his wonted manner, and naturall disposition. Now Scipio was no sooner arrived in A FRICKE, but newes were brought to Rome incontinently, of wonderfull exploytes, and noble feruice done beyond measure: and of great spoyles taken by him, which argued the trothe of the newes. As, the king of the Nv-MIDIANS taken prisoner, two campes of the enemies burnt & destroyed at a time, with losse The famous of a great number of people, armour, and horses, that were consumed in the same: letters and Africke by postes for life ronning in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hannibal home, Scipio Afriand to praye him to hunte no longer after vayne hope that would neuer haue ende, hasting canue. him felfe with all speede possible to come to the rescue of his countrie. These wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of fuche renowine and fame within Rome, that there was

E no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithstanding desisted not to make a newe request, being of opinion they should fend him a successour, alledging no other cause nor reason, but a common speache of every bodie: that it was a daungerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, so great exceeding prosperitie and good successe, bicause it is a rare matter to see one man happie in all things. These wordes dyd so muche mislike the people, that they thought him an enuious troublesome man, or els they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his corage failed with his strength, fearing Hannibal more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hannibal was forced to leave ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not graunte, that the peoples ioye and fecuritie they thought they were in, was altogether cleare, and without feare and mistruste; but gaue it out that then

F they were in greatest daunger, and that the common weale was breeding more mischief now, then before. For when Hannibal (fayed he) shall returne home into Africke, and come before CARTHAGE walles, the ROMAINES shall be lesse able to abide him there, dedes of armes of Tolmides, gaue good cause to Peritles, to entertaine his cittie in feastes, and then they have bene before: and Scipio moreover, shall meete with an armie yet warme, and A embrued with the bloude of so many Prætors, Dictators, and Consuls of Rome, which they haue ouercome, and put to the fword in ITALIE. With these vncomfortable speaches, he still troubled & disquieted the whole cittie, persuading them that notwithstanding the warre was transferred out of ITALIE into AFRICKE, yet that the occasion of seare was no lesse neere Vnto Rome, then it was ever before. But within shorte space after, Scipio having overcome Hannibal in plaine battell in the field, and troden under foote the glory and pryde of CAR THAGE, he brought a greater love to ROME, then they ever looked for : and by this noble victorie of his, he shored vp again the declining state of the empire of Rome, which a litle before was falling downe right. Howbeit Fabius lived not to the ende of this warre, nor ever heard while he lived the joyfull newes of Hannibals happy overthrowe, neither were his yeres pro- R longed to fee the happy affured prosperitie of his countrie: for about that time that Hannibal The death of departed out of IT ALLE, a ficknes tooke him, whereof he dyed. THE COMPARISON OF Pericles with Fabius.

CANAGO ERE haue you heard what is written, of thesetwo great persones. C And forafmuche as they have both left behinde them, many noble examples of vertue, as well in martiall matters, as in civill governmet, let vs beginne to compare them together. First of all, Pericles begane to gouerne the common weale at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefest prosperitie, and of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or fince. The which might feeme to be a cause of the continuall maintenance of the same in securitie without daunger of falling, not so muche for their worthines, as for their common power and felicitie: where contrariwise Fabius acts fell out in the most dishonorable & vnfortunate time, that euer happened to his countrie, in the which he dyd not only keepe the cittie in good state from declining, but raised it vp, and deliuered it from calamitie, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and fucceffe, the victories and triumphes of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valliant playes, whileft he dyd gouerne the fame: and he dyd not finde it in fuch ill case and distresse, that he was driven to defend it by force of armes or to coquer that againe which he had loft. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he fawe before him many overthrowes, great flying awaye, muche murder, great flaughters of the generalles of the ROMAINE armies, the lakes, the playnes, the woddes filled with scattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds and rivers ronning all a gore bloude (by reason of the great slaughter) and the streame carving downe the dead bodies to the mayne sea: dyd take in hande the gouernment of his countrie, and a course farre contrarie to all other: so as he dyd vnderproppe and shore vp the same, that he kept it from flat falling to the grounde, amongest those ruines and ouerthrowes other had B brought it to, before him. Yet a man maye faye also, that it is no great matter of difficultie to rule a cittie already brought lowe by aduerfitie, and which compelled by necessitie, is contented to be gouerned by a wife man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the infolencie of a people, pufte vp with pryde, and prefumption of long prosperitie, as Pericles founde it amongest the ATHENIANS. The great multitude also of so many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the ROMAINES neckes at that time, dyd playnely shewe Fabius to be a graue and a constant man, which would never geue waye vnto the importunate cries of the common people nor could euer be removed from that he had at the first determined. The winning & recovering againe of TARENT VM, maye well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wanne by force: and the citties of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EVBOBA: excepting the cittie of CAPVA, C which the Confuls Fuluim and Appin recovered againe. But it feemeth that Fabins never wanne battell, faue that only for which he triumphed the first time: where Pericles fet vp nine triumphes of battels and victories he had wonne, aswell by sea as by lande. And so also they cannot alledge fuch an acte done by Pericles, as Fabius dyd, when he rescued Minutius out of the handes of Hannibal, and faued a whole armie of the ROMAINES: which doubtles was a famous acte, and proceeded of a noble minde, great wisdome, and an honorable harte. But Pericles, againe dyd neuer commit fo groffe an errour as Fabius dyd when he, was outreached, & deceyued by Hannibals fine stratageame of his oxen: who having founde his enemie by chaunce to have thut him felfe vp in the straight of a vallye, dyd suffer him to escape in the night by a subtiltie, & in the daye by playne force. For he was preuented by ouermuch delaye, D and fought withall by him he kept inclosed. Now if it be requisite, a good captaine doe not only viewell that he hath in his handes, but that he wifely judge also what will followe after, The effect of a then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in fuche forte, as Pericles fayed they would come good generall: to passe: for with ambition to imbrace to muche, they ouerthrewe their estate. But the Ro-MAINES CONTrariwife, having fent Scipio into A FRICKE to make warres with the CARTHAGI-NIANS, wanne all that they tooke in hande: where their generall dyd not ouercome the enemie by fortune, but by valliantnes. So that the wifedome of the one is witneffed, by the ruine of his countrie; and the errour of the other testified by the happy event of that he would have let. Now the faulte is a like in a generall, to fall into daunger, for lacke of forecaste: as for cowardlines to let flippe a fit oportunitie offred to doe any notable pece of feruice. For like The faulte of

that he would not have them yeld to the LACEDEMONIANS in any respect. And yet me Pericles and thinkes Fabius Maximus also would no more geue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but will governflood firme & bold in all dauger, to mainteine thempire of his countrie against them. But the men. goodnes & clemency Fabius Thewed vnto Minutius, doth much condene Perioles accufations & practifes, against Cimon and Thucydides: bothe of them being noble & good men, & taking parte with the Nobilitie, who he expulsed out of ATHENS, & banished for a time. So was Pericles power & authoritie in the comon weale greater; by reason whereof he dyd euer foresee. F that no generall in all his time dyd rashely attempt any thing hurteful vnto the comon weale, except Tolmides onely: who fled from him, & in despight of him went to fight with the Box o-TIANS where he was flaine. As for all other generals, they wholy put the felues into his hads, & dyd obey him for the greatnes of his authoritie. But Fabius, although for his parte he neuer committed any faulte, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernment: yet bicause he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it seemeth in this respect he was desectine. For if Fabius had caried like authoritie in Rome, as Pericles dyd in Athens: the Romaines had not fallen into fo great miserie as they dyd. And for liberalitie: the one shewed it, in refufing the money offred him: and the other, in geuing vnto those that needed, and redeeming dings of Rome parable so ricles dyd beawtifie & adorne the cittie of ATHENS. For neither in qualitie nor quantitie was Pericles there any proportion or like comparison, betweene the exceeding sumptuousnes of the one. workes. and of the other.

Fabius rene- his poore captive contry men. And yet Fabius might dispend no great revenue: for his whole receiptes came only to fixe talents. But for Perieles, it is hard to faye howe riche he was, who had comming in to him, great prefents by his authoritie, aswel of the subjects, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as also of Kings and straunge Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any persone living. And to conclude, as for the sumptuous building of temples, a the stately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in ROME, before the times of the Cefars, they are not to be compared with those, wherewith Pe-

Another time being but a litle boye, he played at skayles in the middest of the streete with other of his companions, and when his turne came about to throwe, there came a carte loden by chaunce that waye: Alcibiades prayed the carter to staye a while, vntill he had played out his game, bi-

The carter being afeard, plucked backe his horse to staye them: the neighbours slighted to see the daunger, ranne to the boye in all hast crying out. tell howe to speake:as for vs Athenians, we have (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectours A and patrones of our countrie, the goddesse Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in olde time (as it is fayed) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that played vpon the flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging these reasons, partely in sporte, and partely in good earnest: dyd not only him selfe leave to learne to playe on the flute, but he turned his companions mindes also quite from it. For these wordes of Alcibiades, ranne from boye to boye incontinently: that Alcibiades had reason to despise playing of the flute, and that he mocked all those that learned to play of it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to playe of the flute, was put out of the number of honest and liberall exercises, and the flute it selfe was thought a vile instrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accusations Antiphon wrote against Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boye, he fled out of his B tutours house, into the house of Democrates one of his louers, and howe Ariphron one of his tutours thought to have made a beadle crie him through the cittie. But Pericles would not fuffer him, faying: that if he were dead, they should knowe it but one daye sooner by crying of him:and if he were aliue, that it would be fuch a shame to him while he lived, that he had bene better he had neuer bene heard of againe. The same Antiphon accuseth him further that he had killed a feruaunt of his that attended on him, in the wrestling place of Sibyrtius, with a blowe of a staffe. But there is no reason to credit his writing, who confesseth he speaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he dyd beare him. Now straight there were many great& riche men that made muche of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates Socrates lone loue vnto him had another ende and cause, which witnessed that Alcibiades had a naturall in-C to Michiader. clination to vertue. Who perceyuing that vertue dyd appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beawtie of his face and bodye, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignitie and authoritie, and the great number of his companions, aswell of the chiefest of the cittie, as of straungers, seeking to entife him by flatterie, and by many other pleasures: he tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to fuffer fo goodly an ympe to lofe the hope of the good fruite of his youthe. For fortune doth neuer fo intangle nor fnare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let & hinder him fo, that philosophie should not take holde on him with her free, seuere, and quicke reasons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, affayed with all delightes, and thut vp as it were in their companie that feafted him with all pleasures, only to turne him that he should not hearken to Socrates wordes, who sought to I bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithstanding, having a good naturall wit, knewe what Socrates was, and went to him, refusing the companie of all his riche friendes and their flatteries, and fell in a kinde of familliar friendshippe with Socrates. Whom when he had heard speake, he noted his wordes very well, that they were no persuasions of a man feeking his dishonesty, but one that gaue him good counsell, & went about to reforme his faultes and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and prefumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe faveth,

And dyd thinke with felfe, that all Socrates love and following of young men, was in dede a E thing fent from the goddes, and ordeined aboue for them, whom they would have preferued, & put into the pathe waye of honour. Therefore be beganne to despise him selfe, and greatly to reuerece Socrates, taking pleasure of his good vsing of him, & much imbraced his vertue: so as he had (he wist not howe) an image of loue grauen in his harte, or rather (as Plato sayeth) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy & honest affection towards Socrates. Insomuch as all the world wondred at Alcibiades, to fee him commonly at Socrates borde, to playe, to wrestle, & to lodge in the warres with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other well willers, who could not fo much as haue a good looke at his handes, and befides became daungerous to fome, as it is fayed he was vnto Anytus, the sonne of Anthemion, being one of those that loued him well. Anytus making good cheere to certen straungers his friendes that were come to see him, F went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refused to goe. For he went to make merie with certen of his companions at his own house, and after he had well

A raken in his cuppes, he went to Anytus house to counterfeate the foole amongest them, and staving at the halle doore, and seeing Anytus table and cubberd full of plate of silver & gold, he commaunded his feruants to take awaye half of it, and carie it home to his house. But when he had thus taken his pleasure, he would come no neerer into the house, but went his waye home. Anytus friendes and guestes misliking this straunge parte of Alcibiades, sayed it was shamefully and boldly done so to abuse Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, sayed Anytus: for he hath left vs some, where he might have taken all. All other also that made much of him, he ferued after that forte . Sauing a straunger that came to dwell in ATHENS: who being but a poore man as the voyce went, fold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred stateres which he brought vnto Alcibiades, & prayed him to take it at his handes. Alcibiades beganne

B to be merie, and being very glad to viderstand his good will towards him, tooke his honest Alcibiades is offer, and prayed him to come to supper to him: so he welcomed him very hartely, and made berall facte. him good cheere. When supper was done, he gaue him his money againe, and commaunded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and landes of the cittle are wont to be let out to those that byd most, and charged him he should out byd all. The poore man would fayne have excused him self, saying, the farmes were to great for him to hyre: but Alcibiades threatned to whippe him, if he would not doe it. For besides the desire he had to pleasure him, he bare a private grudge against the ordinary farmers of the cittie. The next morning the straunger was ready in the market place, where they dyd crie out the letting of their farmes, and he raised one to a talent more, then all other dyd offer. The other farmers were as mad with him as they could be, that they all dyd fet vpon him, crying out: let him put in suertie straight, supposing he could have founde none. The straunger was maruelous blancke thereat, and beganne to thrincke backe . Then cried Alcibiades out alowde to the officers that fate there to take the best offers: I will be his suertie, sayeth he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him faye so, were at their wittes ende, and wiste not what to doe. For they being allwayes accustomed to paye their yerely rent as it went before, by the helpe of the rest of the yeres that followed after: perceyuing now that they should not be able to paye the arrerages of the rentes due to the common weale, and seeing no other remedie, they prayed him to take a pece of money, and to leave the bargaine. Then Alcibiades would in no wife he should take lesse then a talent, which they gaue him willingly.

D So Alcibiades suffered the straunger then to departe, and made him gaine by his deuise. Now Socrates loue which he bare him, though it had many mightie and great aduerfaries, yet it dyd staye much Aleibiades, somtime by his gentle nature, somtime by his graue counsell and aduise: so as the reason thereof tooke so deepe roote in him, and dyd so pearce his harte, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time also being caried awaye with the intifement of flatterers, that held vp his humour with all pleasure and delightes, he stale awaye from Socrates, and made him ronne after him to fetche him againe, as if he had bene a Meibiades flaue that had ronne awaye from his masters house: for Alcibiades stoode in awe of no man ranne from but of Socrates only, and in deede he dyd reuerence him, and dyd despise all other. And therefore Cleanthes was wont to fave, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gaue his other louers holde, which Socrates neuer fought for for to faye truely, Alcibiades Meibiades was muche geuen ouer to lust and pleasure. And peraduenture it was that Thurydides ment of gene to plea-him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of bodie, and dissolute of life. Those that marred Alcibiades quite, dyd still pricke forward his ambition and desire of honour, and dyd put him in the head to thrust him selfe into great matters betimes, making him beleeue that if he dyd but once beginne to shewe him selfe to deale in matters of state, he would not only bleamishe and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Pericles, in authoritie and power among the GRECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made fofte, to be wrought in to any forme, and by colde also doth shut and harden in againe: euen so Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanitie & opinion of him felf, as ofte as Socrates tooke him in hande, was made faste &firme againe by his F good persuasions, insomuch that when he sawe his owne faulte and follie, and how farre wide he had strayed from vertue, he became sodainely very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growen to mans state, he went into a grammer schoole; and asked the

So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equitie and reason, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue judged it on Alcibiades fide, bicause he was of a noble house. But Socrates, bicause he would increase his desire of honour, & would pricke him forward to honest and commendable things, was the very first that witnessed Alcibiades had deserved it: and therefore prayed the captaines to judge him the crowne and complet armour. 216 Alcibiades thereupon bought it, but kept it to him felfe, not regarding Diemedes request to A had made. Diomedes feeing that fell starke mad for anger, and called the goddes & men rowit neffes that Alcibiades did him open wrong and it feemeth that there fell out fitte in lawe vone the same. For Horrates wrote an oration, and drue a plea in defence of Aleibiades, being yet but a childe touching a couple of hories; yet in this plea, his adversarie was called Tilias, and not Dismedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a young man, when he came to practife and pleade publikly, he putall other Oratours to filence, but only two that were euer against him: the one was Pheax the fonne of Eralistratus, and the other Nicias, the fonne of Nicera tus. Of these two, Nicias was a man growen, and had wonne the name & reputation of a good capraine. And Pheax beganne also to come forward as he dyd, being of a good and honorable hed eloquice: a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Empolis layeth: VVordes enouve but no eloquence. There is a certen oration extant in writing, against Alcibiades and Pheax: where among other accufations is brought in howe Alcibiades was ordinarily ferued in his house, with gold & filuer plate that belonged to the comon weale, and which were yied to be borne for state & magnificence, in folemne processions before them, and how he vied them as boldly, as if they had bene his owne. Now there was one Hyperbolus in ATHEN'S at that time borne in the village of Perithoide: of whom Thurydides maketh mencion, as of a naughty wicked man, whose tongue was a fit instrument to deliuer matter to all the Comicall poets of that time, to poore out all their tawnts and mockes against men. Howbeit he was so impudent a persone, and case red fo litle what men fayed of him, that he paffed not though he were defamed, neither dyd any thing greue him, whatfoeuer they reported of him: which fome doe call boldnes, and corage, being no better in deede then plaine impudencie, extreme madnes, and desperate follie. He would never please any man: & if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magistrate, whom they would any waye accuse, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their instrument to vtter their lpyte. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being affembled were ready to proceede to the banishment of Ostracismon by most voyces. The manner & custome of this kynde of banishment was for a time to banish out of their cittie such a one, as seemed of the punish- to have to great authoritie and credit in the cittie: and that was, rather to satisfie their enuie, D then for to remedy their feare. And bicause it was manifest it would fall out to one of them three to be banished (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Pheax) Alcibiades found meanes to joyne all their three factions in one, becomming friends one to another; and having conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus self to be banished, who was the chief instrument to prepare the wave of their banishment. Howbeit other saye, he spake not with Nicias about it, but with Pheax, and ioyning his parte with Pheax, he caused Hyperbolus to be banished, who feared nothing leffe: for it was neuer seene before, that a man of meane countenaunce, and of small authoritie, fell into the happe of this banishment. As Plato the Comicall poet testifieth, speaking of Hyperbolus.

> Although for his deserts, this payne to him is due, or greater punishment prepard the which might make him rue: Tet since he wwas by birth, a persone meane and base, such punishment therefore dyd seeme (for him) to great of grace. Since Ostracismon was, not made at first to be, nor yet deviside as punishment, for suche meane folke as he.

But of this matter, we have spoken more at large before: and now to return a againe to Aleibiades. Nicias had great reputation among straungers, and his enemies greued at it no leffe, then at the honour the cittizens felues dyd vnto him. For his house was the common inne for all LACEDEMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they euer laye withhim: moreover he had very well entertained the LACADEMON prisoners that were taken at the F forte of PYLE. And afterwards when peace was concluded betweene LACEDE MON and A-THEN S, and their prisoners redeliuered home againe by Nisias meanes only & procurement they loued him more then euer they dyd before . This was blowen abroade through GREECE; that Pericles had kindled the warres amongest them, and Nisias had quenched it: fo some called this peace Nicium, as one would faye, Nicius worke. But Acibiades fto. Nicius peach it: 10 to to the came what focuser glorie, determined to breake the peace what focuser came breakshing breaken had no peace of the Wherefore to compatte this matter, knowing first of all that the A R 01.9 B s had no peace of the liking of the LACED & MONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they Gracian.

dyd but seeke matter to fall out with them; he secretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS Moreouer he dyd perfuade them to it, both by letters and worde of mouthe, speaking with the magistrates, and suche as had greatest authoritie and credit amongest the people: declaring vinto them, that they should not seare the La-CEDEMONIANS, nor yeld to them at all, but to sticke to the ATHENIANS, who would fone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwardes when the LACBDEMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the cittle of P ANACT VM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and spoyled, contrarie to the league : Alcibiades perceyuing how the people were funche offended thereat, made them more earnest against them, and therewithall brought Nicias in difgrace with the people, and charged him with many matters of grear likelyhood. As at that time, when he was generall: that he would neuer take any of the LACED & MO-NIANS, when they were thut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and muche leffe diffresse them when he might: and moreouer that when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had founde the meanes to deliuer them, and fend them home againe, to gratifie the LACED EMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friende, he dyd not his ducty to disswade the people from making of league offensiue, and defensiue with the B or o-TIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe also, if there were any people of GRBBCB that had a defire to become friendes and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he dyd the best he could to let them, if the LACEDEMONIANS had no liking of the matter, Now as Nicias was thus in difgrace with the people, for the causes about fayd: in the middest of this sturre, ambassadours came by chaunce from LACEDEMONSO A-THEN S, who at their comming gaue very good wordes, faying they had full powers and commission to compound all controuersies, under reasonable and equal conditions, The Senate heard them, and receased them very curteoully, and the people the next daye should affemble in counsell to geue them audience : which Alcibiades fearing muche; he went to labour the ambassadours, and spake with them aparte in this forte, What meane you, my Lordes of Sparta: doe ye not knowe that the Senate hath all dishiader wayes accultomed to be gracious and fauorable vnto those that sue vnto them for any beguleth the matter, and that the people contrarilie are of a prowde nature, and defirous to imbrace Lacedenne all great matters ? If therefore at the first fight, ye doe gene them to vndetstand that you are come hither with full power, to treate freely with them in all manner of causes: doe you not thinke that they make you stretche your authoritie farre, to graunte them all that they will demaunde. Therefore, my Lordes ambassadours, if you looke for indifferencie at the ATHENIANS handes, and that they shall not prease you to farre against your willes, to graunte them any thing of advantage: I would withe you a litle to courr your full commission, and in open manner to propound cerren articles, and reasonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things and for my parte, I will affire you of my good will in fatiour of the L A cap #-MONIANS. When he had rolde them this tale, he gaud them his faithfull promite, and vowed as it were to performe his worde. Heroupon Aibibades turned the Ambaffadours from the truft they reposed in Niciae, and wanne them on his side in so muche as they gaue credit to no man butto him, worldering muche at his great wifedome and ready, win, and they thought him a rate and notable man. The next morning the people wise aftembled P togetie the ambassadours audience. They were fent for, and brought into the market places There Alcibiades gently asked their, what was the cause of their comming. They authorised that they were come to treater of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. I bear beganne Aleibiades to be angrie with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he to to them : calling them vnfaithfull, vnconflant, and fickle men, that were come neither to de nor fave any thing worth the hearing. The Senate also were offended with them, and the pen ple rated them very roughely: whereat Nicias was fo ashamed and amased withall that he could not tell what to faye, to fee fo fodaine a change, knowing nothing of Alcibrades ma. lice and fubrill practife with the ambaffadours. So the ambaffadours of LACED & MON WER dispatched, without any thing done, and Alcibiades chosen generall: who presently brough the Argives, the Elians, and the Mantinians in league with the Athenians Though no man dyd commend this practife of his, in working it after this forte: yet was it maruelous thing of him to deuise to put all PELOPONNESVS in armes, and to procure find a number of fouldiers against the LACED EMONIANS, as he dyd before the cittie of MAN, TINEA, and to shifte of the miseries of warre and hazard of battell, so farre from A. THENS. Which if the LACED EMONIANS dydwinne, could not profit them muche:and if they lost it, they could hardely faue their cittie of SPARTA. After this battell of MAR. TINEA, the thousand men whom the cittie by an auncient order dyd keepe continually in paye, aswell in peace as in warre, within the cittle of ARGOS, thinking now oportunitie ferued them very trimly: attempted to take the foueraine authoritie from the common people, and to make them selves Lords of the cittie. And to bring this to passe, the LACE DEMONIANS comming in the meane time, dyd ayde them in their purpose, and so dwd put downe the gouernment of the people: notwithstanding, immediatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the stronger. Alcibiades comming thither even at the time, dyd warrant them the victorie, and to let vp againe the authoritie of the people. Then he perfuaded them to make their walles longer to joyne their cittie to the fea, to the ende they might more easely be avded by sea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them also from ATHENS, many carpinters, masons, stone hewers, and other workemen: and to conclude.

he shewed them by all the meanes and wayes he could, that he dyd beare good will your

And when one sayed vnto them, alas, poore people of PATRAS, what doe ye meane the ATHENIANS will care you out. Aleibiades aunswered him, it maye well be, but it shallen by litle and litle, beginning first at the feete: but the LACEDE MONIANS will denoure you all at once, and beginne at the head. Now although Alcibiades dyd make the cittie of A THEN Siftrong by fea, yet he dyd not leaue to persuade the ATHEN I ANS also, to make them selves strong by lande. For he dyd put the young men oftentimes in minde of the other they were made to sweare in Agravios, and dyd aduise them to accomplishe it in deede. Which was, that they should take all corne fields, vines, and olyue trees, to be the borders and confines of ATTI CA, whereby they were taught to reckon all lande theirs, that was manus red, and dyd bring forth fruite . And following these vaine pleasures and delightes, when he was in his galley, he cauled the planckes of the poopethereof to be cutte and broken vertical he might lye the fofter: for his bed was not layed apon the ouerloppe, but laye vponginher strained over the hole, cut out and fastened to the fides and he caried to the warres with him a gilded scutchion, wherein he had no cognizaunce nor ordinary deutse of the A THE 121 A 913 but only had the image of Capide in it sholding lightning in his hande . The nee ble men, and best cittizens of ATHENS perdevaing this, they hated his facious and could tions and were muche offended at him, and were afeard with all of his rathnes and infoles. I cie: he dyd fo contemne the lawes and customes of their countrie, being manifest tokens of a manifilat affired to be King , and would subvert and turne all over hand . And as for the good will

And on a daye as he came from the counfaill and affembly of the cittie, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by meanes thereof had obteined the thing; he defired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon, furnamed Milanthropped as who would fave Loup-garon or the manhater) meeting Alcebiades thus accompanied dyd not passe by him. nor gaue him wave (as he was wont to doe to all other men) but went draight to him, and tooke him by the hande, and fayed. And where Nicias commonly in all his persuasions, dyd turne the ATHENIANE from their purpose to make warres against the SYRACYSANS, as being to great a matter for them to take the cittle of Syracvsa: Alcibiades againe had a further reache in his head, to goe conquer LIBYA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to passe from thence into ITALIE, and foto PELOPONNESY'S: fo that SICILIA should serve but to furnishe them with vittells, and to paye the souldiers for their conquestes which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently caried awaye with a maruelous hope and opinion of this iorney, and gaue good eare to olde mens tales that tolde them wonders of the countries: infomuche as there was no other pastime nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to fet rounde together, drawe plattes of Sicile, and def. R cribe the situation of LIBY A and CARTHAGE. And yet they saye, that neither Socrates the philosopher, nor Meton the astronomer dyd euer hope to see any good successe of this ionney. For the one by the reuealing of his familliar spirite, who tolde him all things to come. as was thought, had no great opinion of it: & Meton, whether it was for the feare of the fucceffe of the iorney he had by reason, or that he knew by divination of his arte what would followe, he conterfeated the mad man, & holding a burning torche in his hand, made as though he would have fet his house a fyer. Other saye, that he dyd not couterfeate, but like a mad me in deede dyd fet his house a fyre one night, and that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to praye the people, that in consideration of his great losse and his grienous calamitie fo late happened him, it would please them to discharge his sonne for going C this voyage. So by this mad deuise, he obtained his request of the people for his sonne, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen captaine, to take charge of men in these warres: who misliked this iorney, aswell for his companion and associate in the charge of these warres, as for other missortunes he foresawe therein. Howbeit the ATHENTANS thought the warre would fall out well, if they dyd not commit it wholy to Alcibiades rashnes and hardines, but dyd ioyne with him the wisedome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus

also for their third captaine, whom they sent thither, though he were waxen now somewhat olde, as one that had shewed him felfe no lesse venturous and hardie in some battells, then Alcibiades him felfe. Now when they came to refolue of the number of fouldiers, the furniture and order of these warres, Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this iorney, and to breake [it of altogether: but Alcibiades withstoode him, and gate the better hande of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who moved the people also that the captaines whom they had chosen for these warres, might have full power and authoritie to leavy men at their difcretion, and to make fuche preparation as they thought good : whereunto the people condescended, and dyd authorise them. But when they were euen readie to goe their waye, many fignes of ill fuccesse lighted in the necke one of another; and amongest the rest this was one. That they were commaunded to take shippe, on the daye of the celebration of the feast of Adonia, on the which the custome is, that women doe fet vp in divers places of the cittie, in the middest of the streams, images, like to dead corfes which they carie to buriall, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funeralles of the E dead, with blubbering, and beating them felues, in token of the forowe the goddeffe Venue made, for the death of her friend Adonis . Moreover , the Hermes (which are the images of Mercurie, and were wont to be fet vp in energlane and streete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled specially in their faces: but this put divers in great feare and trouble, yea even those that made no accompt of suche toyes. Whereupon it was altedged that it might be the Coninthians that dydit, or procured that lewde acte to be done, favoring the S Y R A C V S A N S, who were their neere kynfemen, and had bene the first founders of them, imagining upon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake of the enterprise, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hande. Neuertheles, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their wordes that sayed, F they should not reckon of any such signes or tokens, and that they were but some light brained youthes, that being tippled, had played this shamefull parte in their brauerie, or for sporte.

A But for all thefe reasons, they tooke these signes very groundly, and were in deede not a little afeard, as thinking vindoutedly, that, no man durft have bene fo bolde to have done fuche an ahhominable facte, but that there was some conspiracie in the matter. Hereupon, they looked apon every suspicion and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely soever it were and that very seuerely : and both Senate and people also met in countell vpon it, very ofte, and in a fewe dayes. Now whilest they were busilie searching out the matter, Androcles a common counseller, and orator in the common wealth, brought before the counfell certaine flaues and straungers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed that Alcibiades. and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that forte, and in a mockerie had counterfeated also in a banker that he made, the ceremonies B of the holy mysteries, declaring these matters particularly. How one Theodorus counterfeated the herauld, that is wonte to make the proclamations: Polytion the torche beater, and Als prophaning cibiades the priest, who sheweth the holy signes and mysteries; and that his other compa, the holy my nions were the affiltantes, as those that make sute to be receyued into their religion and or, series. der, and into the brotherhood of their holy mysteries, whom for this cause they call & Mystes. These very wordes are written in the accusation Thessalus (Cimons sonne) made against Altibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddeffes, Ceres, & Proferpina. Whereat the people being maruelously moued and offended, and the orator Androcles his mortall enemie aggrauating & stirring them vp the more against him: Alcibiades a litle at the first beganne to be amased at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners which were C prepared for the voyage of Sicilia, and the fouldiers also that were gathered, dyd beare him great good will, and specially how the ayde, and that bande that came from A a Gos, and Mantinea (being a thousand footemen, well armed and appointed) dyd saye openly, how it was for Alcibiades fake they dyd take vpon them fo long a voyage beyond sea, & that if they went about to doe him any hurte or wrong, they would prefently returne home againe from whence they came: he beganne to be of a good corage againe, and determined with this good fauorable oportunitie of time, to come before the counsell, to aunswer to all fuche articles and accusations as should be layed against him. Thereupon his enemies were a little cooled, fearing least the people in this judgement would have shewed him The ordinal friends, and yet bare him no lesse good will, then the ranckest enemies he had. These fine fellowes rose vp in open assembly, and sayed: it was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the generalles of so mightie and puissant an armie (being ready to hoyse sayle and the avde also of their allies and friendes) should be driven to staye now, and to lose time him his howres and time of aunswer. Therefore, they sayed, it was fit he should take his iorney betimes, and when warres were done, that he should present him selfe to requier iustice, and to purge him selfe of suche matters as should be objected against him . But Afcibiades smelling streight their fetche, and perceyuing the practise of his staye, stept vp. E and declared how they dyd him great wrong, to make him departe with the charge of a generall of so great an armie, his minde being troubled with continuall feare of so grieuous curses, as he should leave apon him: and that he deserved death, if he could not purge and iultifie him felse, of all the vniust and surmised accusations against him. And if he had once clered him felfe of all thinges, and had published his innocencie: he should then haue nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to goe on lustely to fight with his enemies, and to cast behinde him the daunger of all his slaunderous detracters . But all this could not persuade them. And so he was presently commaunded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke, & shippe awaye his men. Thus he was compelled to take the seas with his other companions, having in their nauie about a hundred and forty gallyes, all having three sieile.

F owers to a bancke: & fine thousand one hundred footemen very well armed and appointed,& throwers with flinges, archers, & other light armed men to the number of thirteene hundred, fufficiently furnished of all warlicke and necessarie munition. Now after they were arrived on the coaste of ITALIE, they landed in the cittle of RHEGIO: where , holding counselling A what force they should direct these warres, it was resolved in the ende that they should goe straight vnto Sicilia. This opinion was followed, although Nicias dyd contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his consent thereunto : and at his first comming, he was the occasion of winning the cittle of CATANA. But he neuer after dyd any exployte, for he was called home immediatly by the ATHENIANS, to come and aunswer certaine accusations layed to his charge For as we tolde you before, there was at the beginning, certaine light suspitions and accusations put vp against him, by some slaues and straungers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burdened him more cruelly, adding to his former faulte, that he had broken the images of Mercurie: and had committed facriledge in counterfeating in least and mockery the holy ceremonies of the mysteries: and blue into the eares of the people, R that both the one and the other proceeded of one fet conspiracie, to chaunge and alter the gouernment of the state of the cittie. Vpon these informations, the people tooke it in so ill parte, that they committed all to prisone, that were in any forte accused or suspected thereof. and would neuer let them come to their aunswer: and moreouer dyd much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, upon so great complaintes and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offense was in question before them. And the furie and hatred of the people was such towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their daunger, they were the worse handled for his fake . Thucydides dyd not name his accusers, but some other doe name Dioclides and Teucer: amongest whom, Phrynicus the Comicall poet is one, who discouereth it in his verses, by bringing in one that speaketh thus to C

Phrenicus

the image of Mercury

My good friend Mercury, I praye thee take good heede, that thou fall not and breake thy necke: for so thou mightst me breede. both daunger and distrust, and though I giltles be, some Dioclides falsely might accuse and trouble me. Mercury aunswereth.

Take thou no thought for me, my felfe I shall well faue: and will foresee full well therewith that Teucer(that false knaue) shall not the money get, which he by lavve hath woonne, for his promounters bribing parte, and accusation.

And yet for all this, these tokens doe showe no certaintie of any thing. For one of them being asked, howe he could knowe them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced these images? he aunswered, that he knewe them well enough by the brightnes of the moone. And hereby it appeareth playnely that he was periured, bicause that the same night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a conjunction of the moone. This dyd a little trouble and staye men of judgement: howbeit the common forte of people this notwithstanding, dyd not leaue to be as tharpe set, to receyue all accusations and informations, that were brought in against him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the prisoners whose cause was hanging before them, the orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the historiographer describeth to descend of the race of Vlysses) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the go- E uernment of the common people, and bent altogether to fauour the small number of the nobilitie. But one of the chiefest occasions why he was suspected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his house there was a fayer great image set vp in olde time, by the familie or tribe of the Ageides, and that alone amongest all the rest of so many famous images, was lefte whole and vnbroken: whereupon it is called at this daye, the Mercury of Andocides, and is so called generally of every bodye, albeit the inscription sheweth the contrarie. Andocides being in prisone, chaunced to fall in acquaintaunce with one Timeue, with whom he was more familliar then with all the rest, who was also prisoner with him for the self cause. This Timaus was a man not so well knowen as he, but besides, a wise man, and very hardie. He persuaded him, and put into his head, that he should accuse him selfe, and certaine F other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confessing it, he should receyue grace& pardone, according to the course and promise of the lawe. Where contrarilie, if he should

A stande vpon the curtesie of the judges sentence, he might easely endaunger him self: bicause indgements in fuch cases are vncertaine to all people, and most to be doubted and seared toward the riche. And therefore he told him it were his best wave, if he looked into the matter wifely, by lying to faue his life, rather then to fuffer death with shame, and to be condemned apon this faile accusation. Also he sayed if he would have regarde to the comon wealth. that it should in like case be wisely done of him, to put in daunger a fewe of those which stood doubtfull whether in trothe they were any of them or not) to faue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honest men, who in deede were innocent of this lewde fact. Timeus wordes and persuasions wrought such effect with Andocides, that they made him yeld vnto them, & brought him to accuse him selfe, & certaine other with him: by meanes whereof Alcibiades according to the lawe had his pardone. But all fuche as he named and accused, were enery man put to death, fauing fuche as faued them felues by ronning awaye. Furthermore, to thadowe his acculation with fome apparaunce of trothe, Andocides among those that were accused, dyd accuse also certen of his owne servaunts. Now though the people had no more occasion to occupie their busie heades about the breakers of these images, vet was not their malice thus appealed against Alcibiades, untill they fent the galley called Salaminiana, Alcibiades commaunding those they fent by a speciall comission to seeke him out, in no case to attempt sem for to attempt to take him by force, nor to laye holde on him by violence: but to vie him with all the good decadains. wordes and curteous manner that they possibly could, & to will him only to appeare in perfone before the people to auniwer to certaine accurations put vp against him. If otherwise behalfe within the countrie of their enemies, and that there would have growen some sedition amongest their fouldiers. This might Aleibiades have easely done, if he had bene disposed. For the fouldiers were very forie to fee him departe, perceyuing that the warres should be drawen out now in length, and be much prolonged vnder Nicias, seeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only fourre that pricked Nicias forward to doe any feruice: and that Lamachus alfo, though he were a valliant man of his handes, yet he lacked honour and authoritie in the armie, bicause he was but a meane man borne, and poore besides. Now Alcibiades for a furewell, disapointed the ATHENIANS of winning the cittle of MESSINA: for they ha-

uing intelligence by certaine private persones within the cittie, that it would yeld vp into their handes, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewraved them vnto those that were the Syracus ans friendes: whereupon all this practife was broken vtterly. Afterwards when he came to the cittle of THV RIES, so sone as he had landed, he went and hid him felfe incontinently in suche forte, that such as sought for him, could not finde him. Yet there was one that knewe him where he was, and fayed: Why, how now Alcibiades, darest thou not trust the inflice of thy countrie? Yes very well (4) he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing upon it, I would not trust mine own mother, fearing least negligetly she should put in the blacke beane, where the should cast in the white. For by the first, condemnation of death was figuified: and by the other, pardone of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHE-NIANS for malice had condemned him to death: well, they shall knowe I am yet alive.

The flalus the fonne of Cimon, of the village of LACIADES, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the sonne of Clinias, of the village of Scambonides, to have offended against the goddeffes, Ceres & Proferpina, counterfeating in mockery their holy mysteries, & shewing them to his familliar friends in his house, him selfe apparrelled and arrayed in a long vestemet or cope, like vnto the vestemet the priest weareth when he sheweth these holy facred mysteries: & naming him selfe the priest, Polytion the torche bearer, and Theodorus of the village of PHYGEA the verger, & the other lookers on, brethern, and fellowe scorners with them, & all done in manifest contept & derision, of holy ceremonies and mysteries of the Eumolpides, the religious priests & ministers of the sacred teple of the cittle of ELEVSIN. biades, departed out of the cittie of THYRIES, & went into the countrie of PELOPONNESVS: where he continued a good season in the cittie of ARGOS. But in the ende fearing his ene mies, and having no hope to return againe to his owne countrie with any fafety; he fent yn-to Sparta to haue fafe conduct and licence of the LACED EMONIANS, that he might come and dwell in their countrie, promifing them he would doe them more good being now their friend, then he euer dyd them hurte, while he was their enemie. The LACED & MONIANS graunted his request, & received him very willingly into their cittie:where even you his first comining, he dyd three things. The first was: That the LACED EMONIANS by his persuasion & procurement, dyd determine speedily to fend ayde to the Syracysans, whom they had R long before delayed: & so they lent Gylippus their captaine, to ouerthrowe the ATHENIANS armie, which they had fent thither. The fecod thing he did for them, was: That he made them of GREECE to beginne warre apon the ATHENTANS. The third, & greatest matter of importance, was: That he dyd counsell them to fortifie the cittie of DECELEA, which was within the territories of ATTICA felfe: which confumed, and brought the power of the ATHENIANS lower, then any other thing whatfoeuer he could have done. And if he were welcome, & well esteemed in Sparta, for the service he dyd to the comon wealth: much emore he wanne the loue & good willes of private men, for that he lived after the LACONIAN manner. So as they that fawe his skinne scraped to the fleshe, & sawe him washe him selfe in cold water, & howe he dyd eate browne bread, & suppe of their blacke brothe : would have doubted (or to save of better, neuer haue beleeued) that suche a man had euer kept cooke in his house, nor that he euer had seene so muche as a perfuming panne, or had touched clothe of tiffue made at Mi-LETV M. For among other qualities & properties he had (wherof he was full) this as they fave was one, whereby he most robbed mens hartes: that he could frame altogether with their manners and facions of life, transforming him felfe more easely to all manner of shapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white culler: but Alcibiades Alcibiades could put apon him any maners, customes or facions, of what nation soeuer, & could follows. more chaun. geable then exercise, & counterfeate them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in Spartable the camelion. was very paynefull, & in continual exercise: he lived sparingly with litle, & led a straight life. In Ionia, to the cotrary: there he lived daintely & fuperfluoufly, & gave him felf to all mirthen & pleasure. In THRACIA, he dranke euer, or was allwayes a horse backe. If he came to Tille phernes, lieutenaunt of the mightie king of Persia: he farre exceeded the magnificence of PERSIA in pompe & sumptuousnes. And these things notwithstanding, neuer altered his na-

all fortes of chaunges. But bicause peraduenture, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in divers places where he came, have offended those whose companie he kept, he dyd with fuch a vifer & cloke difguife him felfe, to fit their manners, whom he companied with, by transforming him selfe into their naturall countenaunce. As he that had seene him when he was at Sparta, to have looked apon the outward man, would have fayed as the common prouerbe saveth: It is not the sonne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe:

This vvoman is no chaungeling.

For he entertained Queene Timea, King Agu wife of Sparta, fo well in his absence, he being abroade in the warres: that he got her with childe, & she her selfe denied it not. For she being brought a bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when the was amongest her familliars & very friends, the called him sofetly Alcibiades, the was to farre in lone with him. And Alcibiades leafting out the matter, faved he had done it for no hurte, nor for any lust of fleshe to satisfie his defire: but only to leave of his race, to reigne amongest the LACED EMONIANS. This matter was brought by divers vnto king dgie eares, who at the length beleeued it: but specially when he beganne to make a reckoning of the time, how long it was sence he laye with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ranne out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: fo that it was tenne moneths after ere he lave again with her. Whereinon her fonne Leotychides being borne at the ende of tenne moneths, he faved he was none of his and this was the cause that Leotychides dyd not succede afterwards in the Kingdome. Leotychides GRECIANS) dyd geue him felfe so muche vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him fo well: that he him felfe dyd studie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make muche of him. For he called Alcibiades his fayer house of pleasure, & goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had Michiades many goodly gardens, sweete springes, grene arbours and pleasaunt meadowes, and those in called a pleas many goodly gardens, tweete ipringes, grene arouns and pleataint incadowes, and thorein faunt place all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing veterly to finde any safetie or friends and goodly E shippe emong the Spartans, and fearing on thother side king Agis also: he beganne to profess. speake ill of them, and to disgrace all that they dyd, to Tisaphernes. By this practise he slaved Tisaphernes from ayding them so friendly as he might: moreouer, he dyd noc viterly destrove the ATHENIANS. For he perfuaded him that he should furnishe the LACED EMONIANS but

fawe he loued Alcibiades, and esteemed of him very muche: in so muche as he was sought to, and regarded of all handes of the GRECIANS. ALCIBIADES. about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS were almost in the Ile of Samos, from A where with their armie by fea, they fought to suppresse the rebelles that were vp against them. and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily fitting to refift their enemies, at the least by sea: but they stoode in great seare of the power of Tifaphernes, and of the hundred & fiftie gallyes which were reported to be comming out of the countrie of Phane CIA, to the ayde of their enemies, which if they had come, the cittle of ATHENS had benefit. terly spoyled, and for euer without hope of recourry. The which Alcibiades understanding fent fecretly vnto the chiefest men that were in the armie of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS. IN geue them hope he would make Tisaphernes their friende: howbeit not of any desire he had to gratifie the people nor that he trusted to the communaltie of ATHENS, but only to the honorable, and honest cittizens, and that conditionally so as they had the harte and corage, to B bridell a litle the ouer licentiousnes and insolencie of the common people, & that they would take vpon them the authoritie to gouerne, and to redreffe their state, and to preserve the cittie of ATHENS, from finall and vtter destruction. Vpon this advertisement, all the heades & chief men dyd geue very good eare vnto it: fauing only Phrynichus, one of the captaines, and of the towne of DIRADES. Who mistrusting (that was true in deede) that Alcibiades cared not which ende went forward nor who had the chief gouernment of ATHENS, the nobilitie, or the communaltie, and dyd but feeke all the deuifes and wayes he could, to returne againe if it might be possible, in any manner of forte, and that he dyd but currie fauour with the Nobilitie, blaming and accusing the people: he stoode altogether against the motion, whereupon Alcibiades deuise was not followed. And having now shewed him selfe open enemie to Alcibiades, he dvd & fecretly aduertife Astiochus then admirall to the LACED & MONIANS, Of Alcibiades practife. and warned him to take heede of him, and to laye him up fafe, as a double dealer, and one that had intelligence with both fides: but he understoode not how it was but one traitour to speake to another. For this Astiochus was a follower of Tilaphernes for his prinate commoditie and perceyuing Aleibiades in fuche credit with him, he dyd discouer to Aleibiades all that Phrynichus had aduertised him. Alcibiades straight sent men of purpose to Samos, vnto the captains of nobilitie: for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called them felues fine thoufand. But so sone as they felt them selues strong, and that they had the whole authoritie of gouernment, without contradiction in their handes: they made then no more reckoning of Micibiades, and so they made warres more coldly and slackly then before. Partely bicause they miltrusted their cittizens, who founde the chaunge of gouernment very strange: and partely allo bicaule they were of opinion that the LACED & MONIANS (who at all times dyd most fauour the gouetnment of Nobilitie) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now. the common people that remained still in the cittie, sturred nor, but were quiet against their B willes, for feare of daunger, bicause there were many of them slaine, that boldely tooke apon them in open presence to result these source hundred. But those that were in the campe, in the He of Samos, hearing these newes, were so grieuously offended that they resolved to returne incontinently againe, vnto the hauch of PIREA. First of all, they sent for Alaibiades, whom Middle they chose their captaine: then they commaunded him straightly to leade them against these tyrantes, who had viurped the libertie of the people of ATHENS. But neuersheles he dyd not therein, as another would have done in this case, seeing him selfe so sodainely crept againe in fauour with the common people: for he dyd not thinke he should incontinently please and gratifie the in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their thippes and so great an armie, being before but a banished man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But to the contrarie, as it became a generall worthie of fuche a charge, he confidered with him felfs, that it was his parte wifely to staye those, who would in a rage and furie carelesly cast them selves awaye, and not suffer them to doe it. And truely Alcibrades was the cause of the preserving of the cittle of ATHENS at that time, from vtter destruction. For if they had sodainly (according to their determination) departed from Samos to goe to ATHENS: the enemies finding no man to let them, might easely haue wonne all the countrie of Ionia, of Hellespont, and of all the other Hes without stroke striking, whilest the ATHENIANS were busic fighting one there to accuse Phrynichus of the treason he had revealed against them. Those of the counsal against another in civill warres, and within the compasse of their owne walles. This Alcibiades there, receiving this intelligece: were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he feeing no better alone, & no other, dyd preuent, not only by perfuading the whole armie, and declaring the inwaye to faue him felfe for making of this faulte, went about to make amends with committing conueniece thereof, which would fall out apon their fodaine departure : but also by intrearing a worle faulte. Thereupon he fent againe to Astiochus, complaining muche he had disclosed their shippes, to make a strong watche, and to fortifie them selues with all speede, the which forthwith they dyd. And as they were about it, there came other letters from Alcibiades, by the which he dyd warne them agains to take heede of Phrypichus, bicause hehad practised agains with their enemies, to deliuer the whole armie of A was into their handes But they gaueno credit to his fecond letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparations and minder of the enemies, would ferue his own turne with the falle accusing of Phrynichus. Notwithstanding this, there was some falsehood in felllowshippe s for one Hermon, openly in the market Themmeder of place, stabbed Phrynichus in with a dagger, & killed him. The facte being pleaded in lawe, and abroughly confidered of: the dead-bodie by the fentence of the people was condemned for and his contraitour; and Hermon the murtherer, and his fellowes, were crowned in recompence of their facte they had done to kill a traitour to the common wealth. Wherefore those that were sale eibiades friends, being at that time the stronger, and greatest men of the counsell in the armie at Samos: they fent one Pilander to Athens, to attempt to alter the government, and to en-him: and yet neuertheles he promised him, if he would keepe his counsaill, that he would della uer the whole fleete and armie of the ATHENIANS into his handes. Howbeit this treason of Phrysichus dyd the Athenians'no hurte at all, by reason of Astiochus counter treason: for la dydlet Aleibiades againe understand what offer Phrynichus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this againe, the second time before the counsell, by meanes of Aleibiaton dyd first aduertise the chief of the armie of the ATHEN IANS. That their enemies would come Thrasibulus of the towne of STIRA, dyd helpe him muche: who went through the armie, and cried out apon them that were bent to enterprise this iorney. For he had the biggest and lowdeft voyce as they faye, of any man that was in all the cittle of Athens. This was a notable ment the second agreement for the second agreement fo acte, and a great pece of service done by Alcibiades: that he promised fine hundred faile of of all the dethe Phenicians (which the Laced & Monians affuredly looked for, in their ayde from the king of Persia) should not come at all, or els if they came, it should be in the fauour of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediatly, and went with great speede to Tifaphernes: whom he handled in suche sorte, that he brought not the shippes that laye at rode before the cittle of Aspenda, and so he brake promise with the Laced Emonians. Therefore Alcibiades was maruelously blamed and accused, both of the one & the other side, to have altered Tisaphernes minde, but chiefly of the LACED EMONIANS: who fayed that he had perfuaded this barbarous captaine, he should neither ayde the one nor the other, but rather to suffer them one to denoure and destroye eache other. For it had beine out of doubt, if this great sleete and nauy of the Kings had come, to loyne their force with either partie: that they had taken from the one of them, the figniotie and domination of the fea. Shortely after, the foure hundred noble men that had vsurped the authoritie and gouernment of A HAN'S, were veterly driven awaye and ouerthrowen, by meanes of the friendly ayde, & affiltaunce that Alcibiades friends gave those that tooke the peoples parte. So the cittizens were very well pleased with collections in so muche as they fent for him to returne when he thought good. But he undging with him felfe The timena it would be no honour nor grace vinto him to returne without fome well deferuitie, & before of Athir fine corage the noble men to take upon them the authoritie, & to plucke it from the people; affly he had done fome greater exployte, as only vpon the peoples fauour and good will, whereas de in rinen. ring them that Fifsphernes would give them ayde to doe it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who would otherwise his returne might be both glorious and triumphant: departed first from Sames with a finall number of gallyes, and went failing vp and downe the Hes of Cos and of Gran DOS. There he was aduertifed that Mindarus the admirall of the LACED EMONIANS, was * gone with all his fleete vnto the straight of HBLLESPONT, and that the captaines of the As-THENIANS gaue chase vnto him. Thereupon he went also and sayled thither with speede, to ayde the ATHENTANS: and by very good fortune came with eighteene gallyes euen at the very instant, whe they were both in the middest of their fight, with all their shippes before the Band by fee cittle of ABYDOS. The battell was cruelly foughten between them from morning till night, both the one and the other hauing the better in one parte of the battell, and the worst in ano-

come of More ther place. Now at the first discourrie of Alcibiades comming, both partes had in deede conthe Athenia trarie imaginations of him . For the enemies tooke harte vnto them: and the ATHENIANS beganne to be afeard. But Alcibiades fet vp straight his flagge in the toppe of the galley of his & admirall, to shewe what he was. Wherewithall, he set vpon the PELOPONNESIANS that had the better, & had certen gallyes of the ATHENIANS in chase: whereupon the PELOPONNE-31 ANS gaue ouer their chase, & fled. But Alcibiades followed them so lustely, that he ranne die uersof them a ground, & brake their shippes, & slue a great number of men that lept into the fea, in hope to faue them felues by swimming a lande . So notwithstanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to ayde the LACED EMONIANS, and dyd his best indeuour to faue their gallyes by the fea shore : yet the ATHENIANS in the end wane thirtie gallyes of their enemies, and faued all their owne, and fo dyd fet vp certaine flagges of triumphe and victorie. Alcibiades hauing now happely gotten this glorious victorie, would nedes goe shewe him selfe in triumphe vnto Tifaphernes. So haning prepared to present him with goodly riche presents, and C appointed also a convenient traine & number of fayle mete for a generall, he tooke his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for . For Tifaphernes standing

before bene defamed by the LACEDAE MONIANS, who had coplained of him, that he dyd not fulfill the Kings commaundement, thought that Alcibiades was arrived in very happy hower. whereupon hekept him prisoner in the cittie of SARDIS, supposing the wrong he had done; taken prisoner would by this meanes easely discharge, and purge him to the King. Yet at the ende of thirtie as Sandis, fig- dayes, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, and stealing from his keepers, fled vnto the cittle of CLAZOMENES: and this dyd more increase the suspition they had of Tisaphernes, bicause they thought that under hand he had wrought his libertie. Alcibiades toke then sea again, and went D to feeke out the armie of the ATHEN I ANS. Which when he had founde. & heard newes that Mindarus and Pharnabazus were together in the cittle of Cizicvm: he made an oration to his fouldiers, & declared vnto them how it was very requifite they should fight with their enes mies, both by sea and by lande, and moreouer that they should assault them within their fortes and castells, bicause otherwise they could have no money to defraye their charges. His one tion ended, he made them immediatly hoyse sayle, and so to goe lye at anker in the Ile of P not CONESUS: where he tooke order that they should keepe in all the pinnases and brigantines emong the shippes of warre, that the enemie might have no manner of intelligence of his conming. The great showers of rayne also, with thunder and darke weather that fell out sodainer vpon it, dyd greatly further him in his attempt & enterprise: in so muche as not only his eno. mies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knewe nothing of his comming. So fome made their reckoning, that they could doe litle or nothing all that daye: yet he made them todamely imbarke, and hoyse sayle. They were no sooner in the mayne sea, but they discried a farre of the gallyes of their enemies, which laye at rode before the hauen of CYZICVM. And fearing least the great number of his sleete would make them slye, and take lande before he could come to them: he commaunded certaine captaines to staye behinder & to rowe softely after him, and him felfe with fortiegallyes with him, went towards the enemies to prouoks them to fight. The enemies supposing there had bene no more shippes, then those that were in fight: dyd fet out prefently to fight with them. They were no fooner toyned together, but

Moreover, Mindains, & Pharnabazas, being victorie as come out of the cittie to rescue their people, were overthrowen both, He sue Mindarus in the Cyclem. field fighting valliantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS fooyled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and

tooke besides all their enemies shippes. After they tooke the cittle of CIZYCV M. Pharmabazzat bauing left it. Then the PEL OPONNESIANS being flaine, they had not only the pofferfion of the whole countrie of HELLESPONT, which they kept but they draue their enemies by force. out of all partes of the fea. There were at that time certaine letters intercepted, whereby a fecretarie gaue aduertiffement vnto the Ephori at Spart A, of the ouerthrowe in this force. All is lost Mindarus is slaine, our people dye for hunger, and we know e not what to doe. Now the fouldiers of ATHENS that had bene at this forney and onerthrowe, grewe to fuche a pryde and reputation of them selues, that they would not, and disdained also to serue with the other fouldiers that had bene beaten many times, & went away with the worle. Where they to the contrarie had neuer bene ouercome, as a litle before it happened, that the captaine Thrafyllus had bene overthrowen by the cittie of EPHESVS. And for this overthrowe, the EPHESTANS had fet up a triumphe, and token of braffe, to the utter shame and ignominie of the ATHE NIANS. For the which Alcibiades fouldiers did very muche rebuke Thrafyllus men, and dyd exceedingly extoll their captaine and them selues, and would neither encampe with them neither have to doe with them, nor yet keepe them companie. Vntill suche time as Pharnabaz me C came with a great armie against them, aswell of footenien as horsemen, when they rane a forraging apon the A BY DENIAN stand then Acibiades went to the rescue of them, and gaue Pharnabazus battell, and ouerthrewe him once againe, and dyd together with Thrafyllus chafe him euen vntill darke night. Then both Acibiades and Thrafyllus fouldiers dyd companie together, one rejoycing with another : and so returned all with great joye into one campe. The next morning Aleibiades fet vp a triumphe for the victorie he had the daye before, and then went to spoyle and destroye Pharnabazus countrie, where he was gouernour, & no man durst once come out to meete him. In this rode there were taken prisoners, certaine priestes and Nunnes of the coutrie: but Alcibiades freely delivered them afterwards without ransome. And preparing to make warres against the Chalcedonians, who were regolted fro the Ather D NIANS, & had receyued a garrison & gouernour of the LACEDEMONIANS into their citties

he was advertissed that they had brought in all their goods & cattells out of the fieldes, & had deliuered them to the fafe custodie of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbours & frieds.

That done. hewent & layed feige to the cittle of CHALCEDON, the which he environned all about from Alcibiader the one fide of the fea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thincking to have raised the vittorie at feige. And Hippocrates, a captain of the LACED & MONIANS, that was gouernour of the cittie. Chalcedonia E affembled all the force he was able to make within the fame & made a falve out also your the

having commaunded the rest of his armie to followe him with all speede possible. The gate A was opened to him, and to his thirtie men: befides them there followed twentie other light armed men. Howbeit they were no foner entered the cittie, but they heard the cittizens are med come against them: so that there was no hope to scape, if he dyd tarie their commine. Neuertheles, colidering that vntill that prefent time he was neuer ouercome in battell, where he had taken charge it greued him very muche to flye; wherefore it straight came in his head to make filence by found of trumpet, and after filence made, he caused one of them that were about him to make proclamation with a lowde voyce, that the SELYBRIANIANS should not take armes against the ATHENIANS. This cooled them a litle that would fayne have bene doing bicause they supposed that all the armie of the ATHENIANS had bene already in the daunger. And as they beganne to parle vpon composition, the rest of Alcibiades armie was cittie: the other on the contrarie fide, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further a come on. Now he thincking in deede (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS fought nothing but peace, and fearing least the THRACIANS which were many in number (& came with good will to serue him in that iorney) would sacke and spoyle the cittie, he made them all to goe out againe: and fo concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurte, apon their huble submission, but made them paye him a summe of money, and so leaving a garrison of the ATHENIANS within the cittie, he departed thence. Whileft Alcibiades was in treatie with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN Captaines cerne the A. that laye at the fiege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he should geue them a summe of money, & give vp the towne into the ATHENIANS handes, to enione c it as they had before. And with expresse condition also, that the ATHENI ANS should make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurte or spoyle any of his: and likewise should be

come safe from time to time, to the king of PERSIA. The other captaines being sworn to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned also, that Alcibiades at his returne should likewise be sworne to the peace and conditions thereof, But Alcibiades faved, he would not be fworne at all, vnles Pharnabazus were first sworne for his parte. Thus when othes were taken of either side, Akibiades went also against those of BYZANTIVM, who in like case had rebelled against the A-THEN I ANS. At his first comming thither, he enuironned the cittie round about with a walle. Afterwards he practifed with two fecret friends of his, Anaxilaus, & Lycurgus, & certen other D within the cittie, who promifed him to deliuer it into his handes, so they might be affured he would doe them no hurte. To culler this practife, he gaue it out, that he must nedes leave the fiege, & departe with speede, for certain newes that were come out of I on I A: & thereupon he imbarked presently, & wet out of the hauen at none dayes with all his shippes, howbeit he returned again the same night. And going a lande with the choycest & best armed men he had, he approched the walles of the cittie, without any manner of noyle, having left order with them that remained in the shippes, that in the meane season they should rowe with all force into the hauen, with as great cries and showtes as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies partely to feare the BIZANTINES the more with their fodaine coming among them, & partely that his cofederates within the cittie, might with better oportunitie receyue him & his copa. E nie, into the towne with the more affured fafety, whilest every man ranne to the haven, to refift them that were vpo the gallyes. Neuertheles they wet not away vnfought with. For those that laye in garrison within the cittle, some of the PELOPONNESIANS, other BOROTIANS, & other MEGARIANS, dyd so valliatly repulse them that came out of their gallyes, that they draue the to retire abord againe. Afterwardes hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred: the cittie on thother side, they put them selues in battell raye, & went to mete them. The battell was terrible of both partes: but Alcibiades in the ende obtained victorie, leading the right winge of his battell, & Theramenes the lefte. The victorie being gotten, he tooke 300. of his enemies prisoners, who had escaped the furie of the battell. But after the battell, there was not a BYZANT INE put to death, neither banished, nor his good conscated: bicause it was capitulated by Aleibiades with F his cofederats, that neither he, nor his, should hurt any of the BIZANTINEs either in persone of goodes, nor any way should rish them. And Anaxilam being afterwards accused of treason in

A LACED EMON, for this practife: he aunswered, and justified him felf in suche forte that they rould not finde he had committed the faulte layed vinto his charge. For he fayed, that he was no LACED & MONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: & that he fawe not LACED & MON in daunger, but BYZANTIVM, which the enemies had compassed about with a walle they had built that it was vnpossible to bring any thing into the cittie. Moreover he alleaged, that they having very smal fore of corne within the cittle (as was true in dede) the PELGRONNESIANS, and BOEG-TIANS, that laye there in garrifon dyd eate it vp, while the poore BY ZANTINES them felues. their wives and children, dyed for very hunger. Therefore it could not be fayed of him, that he had betraved his countrie, but rather that he had delivered it from the miferies and calamities the warres brought voon it: wherein he had followed the example of the honestest men of

B LACED & MON, who dyd acknowledge nothing honest and juste, but that which was necesfarie and profitable for their countrie. The LACED & MONIANS hearing his reasons he alleaged for his purgation, were as hamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him goe. Now Alcibiades desirous in the ende to see his native countrie againe (or to speake more truely. that his contry men should see him) after he had so many times ouerthrowen their enemies in battell: he hoysed faile, and directed his course towardes ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallyes of the ATHEN I ANS richely furnished, and decked all about, with skutchines and targettes, and other armour and weapon gotten amongest the spoyles of his enemies. Moreo- more into his uer, he brought with him many other shippes, which he had wonne &broken in the warres, countrie.

Furthermore, me thinkes it should not be true, D that he returning from exile after fo long a banishment, & having passed over such forowes & calamities as he had fusteined, would so prowdly & presumptuously shewe him selfe vnto the ATHENIANS. But merely contrarie, it is most certain, that he returned in great feare & doubt. For when he was arrived in the hauen of PIRE A, he would not fet foote alande, before he first fawe his nephewe Euryptolemus, & divers other of his friendes from the hatches of his shippe, franding apon the fandes in the hauen mouthe. Who were come thither to receyue and welcome him, & tolde him that he might be bolde to lande, without feare of any thing. He was no foner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to feehim, with fo great loue and affection, that they tooke no heede of the other captaines that came with him, but cluftred all to him only, & cried out for joye to fee him. Those that could come neere him, dyd welcome E & imbrace him: but all the people wholy followed him. And some that came to him, put garlands of flowers upon his head: & those that could not come neere him, sawe him a farre of & the olde folkes dyd pointe him out to the yonger forte. But this comon joye was mingled notwithstanding, with teares & sorowe, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes and calamities, & to copare them with their present prosperitie: waying with them selues also how they had not lost Sicilia, northeir hope in all things els had failed the, if they had deliuered them selves & the charge of their armie into Alcibiades hands, when they sent for him to appeare in persone before them. Cosidering also how he found the cittle of ATHENS in manner put from their seigniorie & comandement on the sea, & on the other side how their force by lade was brought vnto fuch extremitie, that ATHENS featly could defend her suburbes, the F cittie felf being so deuided & turmoiled with civill diffention : yet he gathered together those fewe, & small force that remained, & had now not only restored ATHENS to her former power & soueraintie on the sea, but had made her also a conquerer by lande. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, was past before by the people, at the instant request of Cellias, the some A of Callaschrus, who dyd preferre it: as he him selfe dyd testifie in his elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembraunce of the good turne he had done him, faying:

ALCIBIADES.

I was the first that moved in open conference, the people's voyce to call thee home when thou wert banisht hence. So wwas I eke the first wwhich thereto game confent, and therefore maye I boldly saye, by truthe of suche intent: I was the only meane to call thee home avaine. by suche request so rightly made, to move the peoples vayne. And thu maye ferme for pledge, wwhat friendshippe I thee beare:

fast sealed worth a faithfull tongue, as plainely shall appeare. But notwithstanding, the people being affembled all in counfaill, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he first lamented all his mishappes, and founde him selfe grieued a litle with the wronges they had offred him, yet he imputed all in the ende to his curfed fortune, and some spightfull god that enuied his glorie and prosperitie. Then he dilated at oration to the large the great hope their enemies had to have advantage of them: and therewithall perfusded the people to be of good corage, and afeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of golde, and chose him generall againe of A-THENS, with foueraine power and authoritie both by lande as by fea. And at that very instant it was decreed by the people, that he should be restored againe to all his goodes, and that the priestes Eumolpides should absolue him of all their curses, and that the herauldes should with C raine aushoopen proclamation reuoke the execrations and curfinges they had thundered out against him before, by commaundement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, fauing Theodorus the bishoppe, who sayed: I dyd neither excommunicate him, nor curse him, if he hath done no hurte to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades florished in his chiefest prosperitie, yet were there some notwithstanding that misliked very muche the time of his landing: faying it was very valuckie and vafortunate. For the very daye of his returne and arriuall, fell out by channe on the feast which they call Plinteria, as you would save, the washing dave, which they celebrate in honour of Minerus: on the which daye, the prieftes that they call praxiergides, doe make certen fecret and hidden facrifices and ceremonies, being the fine and twenty daye of the moneth of September, and doe take from the image of this goddeffe, D all her rayment and inells, and keepe the image close concred ouer. Hereupon the ATHE-NIANS doe ascribe that daye, for a most vnfortunate daye, & are very circumspect to doe any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly scanned abroade of euery bodye. that it seemed the goddesse was not content, nor glad of Aleibiades returne: and that she dvd hide her selfe, bicause she would not see him, nor have him come neere her. Notwithstanding all these toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found every thing fall out well at his returne, and as he would have wished it: he armed a hundred gallyes presently, to returne againe to the warres. Howbeit he wifely regarded the time and folemnitie of celebration of these mysteries, and considerately stayed untill they had finished all. And it sell out that after the LACED & MONIAN S had taken and fortified the cittle of DECELEA, within the territorie of E ATTICA, and that the enemies being the stronger in the field, dyd keepe the waye going from A THEN S to ELEVS IN, so as by no possible meanes they could make their solemne procession by lande, with fuche honour and denotion as they were before accustomed to doe: and thereby all the facrifices, dawnces, and many other holy denowte ceremonies they were wonte to doe by the waye, in finging the holy fonge of Iacchus, came of very necessicie to be left of and cleane layed a fide. Then Alcibiades thought he should doe a meritorious dede to the godds, and an acceptable to men, to bring the olde ceremonies vp againe vpon the faid feaft: and thereupon purposed to accompanie the procession, & defend it by power, against all inuation restored the & difturbaunce by the enemies. As one that forefawe one of those two things would come to passe. Either that Agus king of the Lacad a montans would not sturre at all against the s facred ceremonies, and by this meanes should much imbase and diminishe his reputation and glorie: or if he dyd come out to the field, that he would make the battell very gratefull to the

A goddes, confidering it should be in defence of their most holy feast and worshippe, and in the fight of his countrie, where the people thould fee and witnesse both, his valliantnes, and also his corage. Alcibiades being fully refolued apon this procession, went and made the priestes Fumolpides, their vergers, and other their ministers and officers of these mysteries, privile to his determination. Then he fent out skowtes to watche on the fide of the hilles thereabouts, and to viewe the waye of their perambulation. The next morning very early he fent out light horsemen also to scowre the countrie. Then he made the priestes, the professed, and all the minifters of religion, goe in procession, together with those that followed the same: and he him felfe compaffed them about with his armie on every fide, marching in battell raye, and very good order, and with great filence. This was an honorable and denoute leading of an armie, R and fuche as if his greatest enemies would confesse a trothe, they could not but saye, Alcibrades had as muche shewed the office of a highe bishoppe, as of a noble souldier and good captaine. So he ended this procession, returning to ATHENS in all safe order againe, and not an enemie that durft once looke out into the field to fet you him. Now this dyd more increase the greatnes of his minde, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his sufficiencie, and wife conduction of an armie: in fo much as they thought him vnuincible, having the foueraine power and authoritie of a generall. Furthermore, he spake so fayer to the poore people, and meaner forte, that they chiefly withed and defired he would take vpon him like a King: yea, and many went to him to perfuade him in it, as though he should thereby withstand all enuic, and drive awaye the lawes and customes of trying of matters by the voyces of C the people, and all fuche fond deuises, as dyd destroye the state of the common weale. And furthermore, they fayed it was very needefull that he alone should take yoon him the whole rule and gouernment of the cittie, that he might dispose all things according to his will, and not stande in feare of slaunderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Aleibiades euer had any minde to vsurpe the Kingdome, the matter is somewhat doubtfull. But this is certaine, the greatest men of the cittle, fearing least in deede he ment some suche thing, dyd hasten his departure as fone as they could possible, doing all other things according to his minde: and dyd affigne him suche affociates in his charge of generall, as he him selfe best liked. So in the Alcibiades ende, he departed with a fleete of a hundred gallyes, and first of all he fell with the Ile of A N- fecond ior-D MONIANS that were amonged them: but he tooke not the cittie, which was one of the first

DROS, where he ouercame by fight, the inhabitantes of the faid Ile, and certaine L ACED Ematters his enemies dyd accuse him for . For if euer man was ouerthrowen and enuied, for the estimation they had of his vallure and sufficiency, truely Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and fundry feruices he had done, wanne him fuche estimation of wisedome and valliantnes, that where he flacked in any feruice what foeuer, he was prefently suspected, iudging the ill fuccesse not in that he could not, but for that he would not: and that where he vndertooke any enterprise, nothing could withstand or lye in his waye. Hereupon the people perfuading them selves, that immediatly after his departure, they should heare that the Ile of Chiowas taken, with all the countrie of Ionia: they were angrie they could have no newes fo fodainely from him as they looked for. Moreouer, they dyd not confider the E lacke of money he had, and specially making warre with suche enemies, as were euer relieued with the great king of PERSIAES ayde, and that for necessities take he was fundrie times driven to leave his campe, to seeke money where he could get it, to paye his soul- Lacke of modiers, and to mainteine his armie. Now for testimony hereof, the last accusation that was a - ney, the occagainst him, was only for this matter. Lyfander being sent by the LACED & MONIANS for ad- fin of the o- nerthrows of mirall and generall of their armie by fea, yfed suche policie with Cyrus, the king of P B R - the Athenia STARS brother, that he got into his handes a great some of money : by meanes whereof he amie by sea gauevnto his mariners foure oboles a daye for their wages, where before they were wont to have but three, and yet Alcibiades had muche a doe to furnishe his with three only a dave. For this cause, to get money, Alcibiades failed into CARIA. But in the meane time Antio-

F chus, whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenaunt behind him, and had geuen him charge of all the shippes in his absence, being a very skilfull sea man, but otherwise a hastie harebraynd foole, and of small capacitie: he being expressely commaunded by Alcibiades nor to fight in ning of his straight commaundement, that he armed his owne gallye, whereof him selfe was captaine, and another besides, and went to the cittle of EPHESVS, passing all alonge his ene.

Lysander being maruelously prouoked by those wordes, went and encountered him at the first with a fewe shippes. The other captaines of the gallyes of the ATHENIANS, feeing Antiochu in daunger, went to ayde him, one after another. Then Lylander of his parte also let out all his whole fleete against him, and in the end ouercame them, Antiochus self was killed in the con-Lifander flict, and many gallyes and men were taken prisoners: wherefore Lysander set vp shewes of triumphe in token of victorie. Alcibiades hearing these ill fauored newes, returned presently with read of the Land of the care thither, he went with all the rest of his sleete B' outreame the to offer Lylander battell. But Lylander quietly contenting him selfe with his first victorie: went Athenians.

not out against him. Now this victorie was no soner wonne, but one Thraspbulus the sonne of Thrason, Alcibiades enemie, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS, to accuse Alcibiades to the people: whom he informed how all went to wracke, and that he had accopied again lost many shippes, for that he regarded not his charge, carelessy putting men in truste, whom he gaue to great credit to, bicause they were good fellowes, and would drincke droncke with him, & were full of mariners mockes and knauishe leastes, such as they vie commonly amongest them selues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleasure abroade, here, and there, fcraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheere, and feafting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN courtifans, when the enemies armie was so neere theirs as it was, C Moreouer, they layed to his charge, that he dyd fortifie a castell in the countrie of THRA-CIA, neere vnto the cittie of BIS ANTHE, for a place to retire him selfe vnto, either bicause he could not, or rather that he would not, live any lenger in his owne countrie. Vpon those accufations, the ATHENIANS gening ouer credit to the reporte: dyd immediatly choose newe captaines, and thereby declared their misliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing least they would doe him some worse harme, dyd leaue straight the ATHENIAN'S campe, and gathering a certaine number of straungers together, went of him selfe to make warre apon certaine free people of the THRACIANS, who were subject to no prince nor state: where he got a maruelous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he dyd assure the GRECIANS inhabiting those marches, from all inuation of forreine enemies. Now Tydeus, Menander, and Adimanthus the Athenians captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the goates riuer, with all the gallyes the cittie of Athens had at that time apon that coast: vied energy morning commonly to goe to the sea, to offer battell to Lysander, who rode at an ancker be-Lyfanderrede fore the cittle of Lampfacus, with all the LACED EMONIANS armie by fea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watche or warde, as men that were careles of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the lande nor farre of, and finding their great faulte and negligence: tooke his horse,& went to them, and told them that they laye on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driven to feeke their vittells, as farre as to the cittle of SESTOS, & that they fuffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, &goe a lande when they laye at ancker straggling vp and downe R the countrie as they would them selves, without regarde that there laye a great armie of their enemies before them, readie to be fet out at their generalles commaundement; and therefore he aduised them to remoue thence, and to goe cast ancker before the cittie of Sestos. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, Tydens, one of the captaines, flowtely commaunded him to get him awaye, as one that had nothing to doe with the matter, & that other had charge of the armie. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, dyd departe presently from them. And as he went his waye, he fayed to some of his friendes which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the ATHENIANS had not bene fo rounde with him he would have forced the LACED EMONIANS to have come to the battell in despight of their F beardes, or els he would have driven them to forfake their shippes. Some tooke this fora glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to have done it, bicause he could have

A brought from lande a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horsemen, with whom he might have geven a charge vpon the LACED EMONIANS, and done great mischief vnto their campe. But now, how wifely Alcibiades dyd foresee the faultes he tolde the ATHE-NIAN'S captaines of: their great misfortune & losse that followed incontinently, did to plainely witnesse it to the worlde. For Lysander came so fiercely apon them on a sodaine, that of all the shippes they had in their whole fleete, only eight gallyes were faued, with whom Conon Aed:and the other being not much leffe then two hundred in number, were every one of them The Athetaken and caried awaye, with three thousand prisoners whom Lysander put to death. Shortely after he tooke the cittle felf of ATHENS, and rafed their long walles even to the ground. After lander, this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing fore the LACEDE MONIANS, who then Athensiaken B' without let or interruption of any, were only Lords and Princes by sea and by lande: he went into the countrie of BITHYNIA, and caused great good to be brought after him, and tooke a Alcibidete maruelous fume of money with him, besides great riches he lest also in the castells of THRA- steel into the CIA, where he dydremaine before. Howbeit he lost much of his goodes in BITHYNIA, which Bithynia. certaine THRACIANS dwelling in that countrie had robbed him of, & taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king Artaxerxes, hoping that when the King had once proued him, he should finde him a man of no lesse service, then he had found Themistocles before him: besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be muche juster then his was. For he dyd not goe thither, to niake warre against the cittle of ATHENS and his countrie, as Themistocles did:but of a cotrarie intent, to make intercession to the King, that it would please C him to ayde them. Now Alcibiades thinking he could vie no better meane, then Pharnabazue helpe only, to fee him fafely conducted to the Kings courte: he proposed his jorney to him. into the countrie of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certaine time to atted you him, & was very honorably entertained and receyued of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHEN I ANS founde them selues desolate, & in miserable state to see their empire lost: but then much more, when Lyfander spe Lyfander had taken all their liberties, and dyd fet thirtie gouernours ouer their cittie. Now to pointed 30. late, after all was lost (where they might have recovered againe, if they had bene wise) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miseries and wretched state, looking backe apon of Athense all their wilfull faultes and follies committed: emong which, they dyd reckon their fecond To later open.

time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greatest faulte. So they banished him only of ma-D lice and displeasure, not for any offense him selse in persone had committed against them, sauing that his lieutenaunt in his absence had shamefully lost a fewe of their shippes: and they them selves more shamefully had driven out of their cittie, the noblest souldier, and most skilfull captaine that they had. And yet they had some litle poore hope lefte, that they were not altogether cast awaye, so long as Alcibiades lived, and had his health. For before, when he was a forfaken man, and led a banished life; yet he could not live idely, and doe nothing. Wherefore now much more, fayed they to them felues: if there be any helpe at all, he will not fuffer out of doubt the infolencie & pryde of the LACED EMONIANS, nor yet abyde the cruelties and outrages of these thirtie tyrauntes. And surely the common people had some reason to have these thoughts in their heades, considering that the thirtie governours them E felues dyd what they could possiblie to spye out Aleibiades doinges, and what he went about. In fo muche as Critius at the last, declared to Lylander, that so long the LACE-DEMONIANS might reckon them selves Lordes over all GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authoritie of the cittie of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithstanding the people of ATHENS could well awaye to live like subjects vnder the gouernment of a fewe: yet Alcibiades whilest he lived, would never suffer them so to be reigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuise he could to bring a chaunge and innouation emong them. Yet Lylander would not credit these persuasions, before speciall commandement was fent to him from the Senate of LACED EMON, vpon his allegiaunce, that he should deuise to kill Acibiades by all meanes he could procure: either The Lacede-F bicause in trothe they feared the subtiltie of his wit, and the greatnes of his corage, to en-monians will terprise matters of great weight and daunger, or els that they sought to gratifie king A- Lysander to gie by it. Lyfander being thus straightly commaunded, dyd fend and practife incontinently dec.

Now was Alcibiades in a certen village of PHRYGIA, with a concubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how the dandling him in her armes, had dreffed his head, frifeling his heare, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other fave that he thought Magaus strake of his head, and made his bodie to be burnt: and the voyce goeth, this vision was but a litle before his death. Those that were fent to kill him, durst not enter the house where he was, but set it a fire round about . Alcibiades spying the fire, got fuche apparell and hanginges as he had, and threwe it on the fire, thincking to have put it out: and so casting his cloke about his left arme, tooke his naked sworde in his other hande. and ranne out of the house, him selfe not once touched with fyer, fauing his clothes were a R litle finged. These murderers so sone as they spied him, drewe backe, and stoode a sonder, and durst not one of them come neere him, to stande and fight with him: but a farre of, they beflowed to many arrowes and dartes of him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his bodie which the wrapped vp in the best linnen the had, and buried him as honorably as the could possible, with suche things as the had, and could get together. faye, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lylander, nor the LACED & MONIANS, which caused him to be staine: but that he keeping with him a young gentlewoman of a noble house, whom he had stolen awaye, and intifed to follie: her brethern to reuenge this iniurie, went to fet fire voon the house where he was, and that they killed him as we haue tolde you, thinking to leape out of the fyre.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS

Martius (oriolanus.

HE house of the Martians at Rome was of the number of the Patri- The familie cians, out of the which hath fprong many noble personages: whereof of the Mar-Ancus Martius was one, king Numaes daughters sonne, who was king of Rome after Tullus Hostilius. Of the same house were Publius, and Quintus, who brought to Rome their best water they had by con- Public and ducts. Cenforinus also came of that familie, that was so surnamed, bi-cause the people had chosen him Censor twise. Through whose per- brought the fuafion they made a lawe, that no man from thenceforth might re

Caisus Martius, whose life we Rome. intend now to write, being left an orphan by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a conformus widowe, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many discommodities to a law. childe, but doth not hinder him to become an honest man, and to excell in vertue aboue the common forte: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully doe complayne, that it is the occasion of their casting awaye, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to see them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man also is a good proofe to confirme forme mens opinions. That a rare and excellent witte vntaught, doth bring forth many crisique good and euill things together: like as a fat foile bringeth forth herbes & weedes that lieth vn- . manured. For this Martine naturall wit and great harte dyd marueloufly sturre vp his corage, to doe and attempt notable actes. But on the other fide for lacke of education, he was so chollericke and impacient, that he would yeld to no living creature: which made him churlishe, C vacinill, and altogether vafit for any mans convertation. Yet men marveling much at his conflancy, that he was neuer ouercome with pleasure, nor money, and howe he would endure eafely all manner of paynes and trauailles: thereupon they well liked and commended his flowines and temperancie. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one cittizen yfeth to be with another in the cittie. His behauiour was fo vnpleafaunt to them, by reafon of a certaine insolent and sterne manner he had, which bicause it was to lordly, was disliked. And to faye truely, the greatest benefit that learning bringeth men vnto, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compasse and rule of reason, to be civill and curteous, & to like better the meane state, then the higher. Now in those dayes, vallantnes was A honoured in Rome about all other vertues: which they called Virtus, by the name of vertue felfe, as including in that generall name, all other speciall vertues besides. So that Virtus in the Latin, was asmuche as valliantnes. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time : beganne from his Childehood to gene him felf to handle wespons, and daylie dyd exercise him selfe therein. And outward he esteemed armour to no purpose, vales one were naturally armed within. Moreouer he dyd so exercise his bodie to hard.

The first time he went to the warres, being but a strippling, was when Tarquine surnamed the prowde (that had bene king of Rome, and was driven out for his pride, after many attemptes made by fundrie battells to come in againe, wherein he was euer ouer come) dyd come to Rome with all the ayde of the LATINES, and many other people of ITA-LIE: euen as it were to fet vp his whole rest apon a battell by them, who with a great & mightie armie had vndertaken to put him into his Kingdome againe, not fo much to pleasure him, as to ouerthrowe the power of the ROMAINES, whose greatnes they both feared and enuied. In this battell, wherein were many hotte and sharpe encounters of either partie, Martine valliantly fought in the fight of the Dictator: & a Romaine fouldier being throwen to the groud euen hard by him, Martins straight bestrid him, and flue the enemie with his owne handes C that had before ouerthrowen the ROMAINE. This was, either bicause the lawe dyd this honour to the oke, in fauour of the ARCADIANS, who by the oracle of Apollo were in very olde time called eaters of akornes: or els bicause the souldiers might easely in euery place come by oken

And this is the cause, why the daye of this victorie (which was the fiftenth of Iulye) is confecrated yet to this daye vnto Castor and Pollux. Moreouer it is daylie seene, that honour and reputation lighting on young men before their time, and before they have no great corage by nature: the defire to winne more, dieth straight in them, which easely happeneth, the fame having no deepe roote in them before. Where contrariwife, the first honour that valliant mindes doe come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, hasting them forward as with ther defier of reward for service done, but rather take it for a remembraunce and encoragement, to make them doe better in time to come: and be ashamed also to cast their honour at their heeles, not feeking to increase it still by like deserte of worthie valliant dedes. This desire being bred in Martius, hestrainedstill to passe him selfe in manlines: and being desirous to shewe a daylie increase of his valliantnes, his noble service dyd still advaunce his same, bringing in spoyles apon spoyles from the enemie. Whereupon, the captaines that came afterwards (for enuie of them that went before) dyd contend who should most honour him, and who should beare F most honorable testimonie of his valliantnes. In so much the ROMAINES having many warres and battells in those dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence he returned not without some rewarde of honour. And as for other the only refued that made them valliant, was they hoped to have honour: but touching Martine, the only thing that made him to loue honour, was the loye he fawe his mother dyd take of him. For he thought nothing made him to happie and honorable, as that his mother might heare every hodie praife and commend him, that the might allwayes fee him returns with a crowne vpon his head, and that the might still embrace him with teares ronning downe her cheekes for iove. Which desire they saye Epaminondas dyd auowe, and confesse to have bene in him: as coriolanus & to thinke him selfe a most happie and blessed man, that his father and mother in their life time Epaminondas had seene the victorie he wanne in the plaine of LEVCTRES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had then define of

For those that had vierers come litle, were yet spoyled of that litle they had by their creditions, for lacke of abilitie to paye plained of as theylerie: who offered their goodes to be folde, to them that would geue most. And suche as people. had nothing left, their bodies were layed holde of, and they were made their bonde men, notwithstanding all the woundes and cuttes they shewed, which they had receyued in many bat-C rells fighting for defence of their countrie and common wealth: of the which, the last warre they made, was against the SABYNES, wherein they fought apon the promise the riche men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate them more gently, and also vpon the worde of Marcus Valerius chief of the Senate, who by authoritie of the counsell, and in the counsellers behalfe of the riche, fayed they should performe that they had promised . But after that they hadfaithfully ferued in this last battell of all, where they ouercame their enemies, seeing they m hope of inft were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would geue no performance. eare to them, but make as though they had forgotten their former promife, and suffered them and seed fer. to be made flaues and bonde men to their creditours, and besides, to be turned out of all that were very sure of the state euerthey had: they fell then euen to flat rebellion and mutine, and to sturre vp daungerous ded proseketh D tumultes within the cittle. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion, dyd ftraight enter the territories of Rome with a maruelous great power, spoyling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by founde of trumpet, pinions emong them felues. For some thought it was reason, they should somewhat yeld to the poore peoples request, and that they should a litle qualifie the severitie of the lawe. Other held hard against that opinion, and that was Martins for one. For he alleaged, that the credi- Marine cotours losing their money they had lent, was not the worst thing that was thereby: but that the lenitie that was fauored, was a beginning of disobedience, and that the prowde attempt of the people. communaltie, was to abolish lawe, and to bring all to confusion. Therefore he fayed, if the Senate were wife, they should betimes preuent; & quenche this ill fauored & worfe ment beginning. The Senate met many dayes in confultation about it but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore comon people seeing no redresse, gathered them selues one daye together.

& one encoraging another, they all for looke the cittle, & encamped them felues upon a hill, they the citcalled at this daye the holy hill, along eff the river of Tyber, offering no creature any hutte or vie and doe violence, or making any shewe of actuall rebellion: fauling that they cried asking went vp and see to the hodown, that the riche men had driven them out of the cittie, and that all I was through they should finde aver, water, & ground to burie them in. He, after many good persuasions and gentle requestes made to the people, on the behalfeer the Senate: knit vp his oration in the ende, with a notable tale, in this manner. That on a time all the members of mans bodie, dyd rebell against the bellie, complaining of it, that it only remained in the middest of the bodie, without doing any thing, neither dyd beare any laboured the maintenaunce of the rest: whereas all other partes and members, dyd labour paynefully, &was very carefull to fatisfie the appetites and defiers of the bodie. And so the bellie, all this

For matters being well digefted, & their confells throughly examined, tou- h ching the benefit of the common wealth: the Senatours are cause of the common comodine that cometh vnto every one of you. These persuasions pacified the people, conditionally, that the Senate would graunte there should be yerely chosen fine magistrates, which they now call

So Iunius Brutus , and Sicinius Vellutus , were the first Tribunes of the people that were Tribuni ple. chosen, who had only bene the causers & procurers of this sedition. Hereupon the cittie being Iunius Brugrowen agains to good quiet and vnitie, the people immediatly went to the warres, thewing suc Sicinius that they had a good will to doe better then ever they dyd, and to be very willing to obey the Vellutus , the magistrates in that they would commaund, concerning the warres. Martius also, thoughing 2. first Tri-

In the countrie of the Volsces, a gainst whom the Romaines made warre at that time, there was a principall cittle & of most

Corioles be- Wherefore all the other VOLSCES fearing least that cittie should be taken by affault, they fieged by the came from all partes of the countrie to faue it, entending to geue the ROMAINES battell be fore the cittie, and to geue an onset on them in two seuerall places. The Consul Cominius, ya. h derstanding this deuided his armie also in two partes, and taking the one parte with him selle. he marched towards them that were drawing to the cittie, out of the countrie; and the other parte of his armie he left in the campe with Titus Lartius (one of the valliantest men the Re-MAINES had at that time) to refult those that would make any salve out of the cittle apon them. So the Corto DAN's making small accompt of them that laye in campe before the cittie made a falye out apon them, in the which at the first the Corto LANS had the better, and draue the ROMAINES backe againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, ronning out of the campe with a fewe men with him, he flue the first enemies he met withall, and made the rest of them staye vpon a sodaine crying out to the Romaines that has turned their backes, and calling them agains to fight with a lowde voyce, For he was even fuch another, as Cate would have a fouldier and a captaine to be: not only terrible, and fierce to lave about him, but to make the enemie afeard with the founde of his voyce, and grimnes of his countenaunce. Then there flocked about him immediatly, a great number of ROMATINES whereat the enemies were fo afeard, that they gave backe prefently . But Martius not staying so, dyd chase and followe them to their owne gates, that fled for life. And there, perceyuing that the Romannes retired backe, for the great number of dartes and arrowes which flewer bout their eares fro the walles of the cittie, & that there was not one man amongeft them that durst vencer him selfe to followe the flying enemies into the cittie, for that it was full of menof warre, yeth well armed, and appointed: he dyd encorage his fellowes with wordes and dedes serving out to them, that fortune had opened the gates of the cittie; more for the followers, the the flyers, But all this notwithstanding fewe had the hartes to followe him, Howbeit Martin being in the throng emong the enemies, thrust him selfe into the gates of the cittie, and enrred the same emong them that fled, without that any one of them durst at the first turne their face you him, or els offer to staye him. But he looking about him, & seeing he was entred the cittie with very fewe men to helpe him, & perceyuing he was enuironned by his enemies that gathered round about to fet apon him: dyd things then as it is written, wonderfull & incredible. aswell for the force of his hande, as also for the agillitie of his bodie, and with a wonderfull corage & valliantnes, he made a lane through the middest of them, and ouerthrewe also those he laved at: that some he made ronne to the furthest parte of the cittie, & other for feare he made yeld them selues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Lartius that was gotten out, had some leysure to bring the ROMAINES with more fafety into the cittie.

The cittle being taken in this forte, the most parte of the souldiers beganne incontinently to The cities of B spoyle, to carie awaye, & to looke vp the bootie they had wonne. But Martius was marue- Corioles take. lous angry with them, and cried out on them, that it was no time now to looke after spoyle, & to ronne straggling here and there to enriche them selues, whilest the other Consul and their fellowe cittizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and howe that leauing the spoyle they should seeke to winde them selues out of daunger and perill. Howbeit crie, and fave to them what he could, very fewe of them would hearken to him. Wherefore taking those that willingly offered them selues to followe him, he went out of the cittie. and tooke his waye towardes that parte, where he vnderstoode the rest of the armie was: exhorting and intreating them by the waye that followed him, not to be fainte harted, and ofte holding vp his handes to heaven, he befought the goddes to be fo gracious and favorable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, and in good hower to hazarde his life in defence of his country men. Now the ROMAINES when they were put in battell rave. and ready to take their targettes on their armes, and to guirde them vpon their arming coates, had a custome to make their willes at that very instant, without any manner of writing, naming him only whom they would make their heire, in the presence of three or foure flaments,

Then they all beganne to call vpon the Conful to marche forward, and to delaye no lenger,

The Consul made meaner, the him aunswer, that he thought the bandes which were in the voward of their battell, were Volsciwere those of the ANTIATES, whom they esteemed to be the warlikest men, and which for valliant corage would geue no place, to any of the hoste of their enemies. Then prayed Martim, to be fet directly against them. The Consul graunted him, greatly prayling his corage. Then Martins, when both armies came almost to joyne, aduaunced him selfe a good space before his companie, and went fo fiercely to geue charge on the voward that came right a-enemies, and brake their arraye: and feattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, bicause they sawe he was able to doe no more, he was already so wearied with the great payne he had taken, and so fainte with the great woundes he had apon him. But Martins aunswered them, that it was not for congainst him, that they could stande no lenger in his handes: he made suche a lane through them, and opened a passage into the battell of the enemies. But the two winges of either fide turned one to the other, to compasse him in betweene them : which the Conful Cominius perceyuing he fent thither straight of the best souldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruelous bloudie about Martius, and in a very shorte space many were flaine in the place. But in the ende the ROMAINES were so strong, that they distressed the

that fled, vntill suche time as the armie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowen, and numbers of them flaine, and taken prisoners. The next morning betimes, Martins went to the Conful, and the other ROMAINES with him. There the Conful Cominius going vp to his chayer of state, in the presence of the whole armie, gaue thankes to the goddes for so great, glorious, and prosperous a victorie: then he spake to Martius, whose valliantnes he commended beyond the moone, both for that he him felfe fawe him doe with his eyes, as also for that Martins had reported vnto him. So in the ende he willed Martins, he should choose out of all the horses they had taken of their enemies, and of all the goodes they had wonne (whereof there was great store) tenne of every forte which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Besides this great honorable offer he had a made him, he gaue him in testimonie that he had wonne that daye the price of prowes aboue all other, a goodly horse with a capparison, and all furniture to him: which the whole armie beholding, dyd marueloufly praife and commend. But Martius stepping forth, tolde the Conful, he most thankefully accepted the gifte of his horse, and was a glad man befides, that his feruice had deferued his generalls commendation; and as for his other offer. which was rather a mercenary reward, then an honorable recompence, he would none of it, but was contented to have his equall parte with other fouldiers. Only, this grace (faved honour in the he) I craue, and befeeche you to graunt me. Among the Voisces there is an olde Martius nofriende and hoste of mine, an honest wealthie man, and now a prisoner, who living before in great wealth in his owne countrie, liueth now a poore prisoner in the handes of C & refufall, his enemies: and yet notwithstanding all this his miserie and misfortune, it would doe me great pleasure if I could saue him from this one daunger: to keepe him from being solde as a slave. The fouldiers hearing Martius wordes, made a maruelous great showte among them: and they were moe that wondred at his great contentation and abstinence, when they fawe so litle couetousnes in him, then they were that highely praised and extolled his valliantnes. For even they them felues, that dyd fomewhat malice and envie his glorie, to fee him thus honoured, and paffingly prayfed, dyd thincke him fo muche the more worthy of an honorable recompence for his valliant feruice, as the more carelesly he refufed the great offermade him for his profit; and they efteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse suche rewards, then that which made them to be offred him. D as vnto a worthie persone. For it is farre more commendable, to vse riches well, then to be valliant: and yet it is better not to defire them, then to vie them well. After this showte and novse of the assembly was somewhat appeased, the Consul Cominius beganne to speake in this forte. We cannot compell Martius to take these giftes we offer him, if he will not recease them: but we will geue him suche a rewarde for the noble service he hath done, as he cannot refule. Therefore we doe order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, onleshis valliant acts have wonne him that name before our nomination. And so ever fince, he stil bare the third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the ROMAINES lanus by the Conful. haue, as Caisis: was our Christian name now. The second, as Martius: was the name of the How the Ro. house and familie they came of. The third, was some addition geuen, either for some acte or I maines came to three notable service, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their bodie, or els for VVhythe Kings furfomespeciall vertue they had. Euen so dyd the GRECIANS in olde time give additions to Gracial gave Princes, by reason of some notable acte worthic memorie. As when they have called some, Soter, and Callinicos: as muche to fave, fauiour and conquerour. Or els for fome notable apparaunt marke on ones face, or on his bodie, they have called him Phiscon, and Grypos: as ye would fave, gorebelley, and hooke noted: or els for some vertue, as Euergetes, and Phyladelphon to wit, a Benefactour, and louer of his brethern . Or otherwife for ones great felicitie, as Estdemon: as muche to faye, as fortunate. For fo was the fecond of the * Battes furnamed. And fome Kings have had furnames of least and mockery. As one of the Antigones that was that built the called Doson, to save, the Gener: who was ener promising, and never gening. And one F of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to faye, conceitiue. The ROMAINES vie more then any other nation, to give names of mockerie in this forte. As there was one Metellus furnamed

A furnamed Diadematus, the banded : bicause he caried a bande about his heade of longe time, by reason of a fore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne familie was called Names of Celer: the quicke flye. Bicause a fewe dayes after the death of his father, he shewed the people the cruell fight of fensers at vnrebated swordes, which they founde wonderfull for the thormes of time. Other had their furnames derived of some accident of their birthe. As to this daye they call him Proculeius, that is borne, his father being in some farre voyage: and him Posthumius, that is borne after the deathe of his father. And when of two brethern twinnes, the one doth dye, and thother furuiteth: they call the furuiter Vopiscus. Somtimes also they geue surnames deriued of some marke or misfortune of the bodie. As Sylla to fave, crooked nofed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Cacus, blinde: Claudus, lame, They dyd wifely R in this thing to accustome men to thincke, that neither the losse of their sight, nor other such misfortunes as maye chaunce to men, are any shame or disgrace vnto them, but the manner was to aunswer boldly to suche names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters would be better amplified in other stories then this . Now when this warre was ended, the flatterers of the people beganne to flurre vp fedition againe, without any newe occasion, or iust matter offered of complainte. For they dyd grounde this seconde insurrection against the Nobilitie and Patricians, apon the peoples milerie & misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discorde and sedition betweene them and the Nobilitie. Bicause the most parte of the errable lande within the territorie of Roms, was become heathie and barren for lacke of plowing, for that they had no time nor meane to cause corne. C to be brought them out of other countries to fowe, by reason of their warres which made the sedition extreme dearth they had emog them. Now those busic pratiers that fought the peoples good Remember reas will, by fuche flattering wordes, perceyuing great scarsitie of corne to be within the cittie, and some of families. though there had bene plenty enough, yet the common people had no money to buye it: they foread abroad false tales and rumours against the Nobilitie, that they in reuenge of the people, had practifed and procured the extreme dearthe emong them. Furthermore, in the middest of this sturre, there came ambassadours to Rome from the cittle of Veritres, that offered vp their cittie to the Romaines, and prayed them they would fend newe inhabitants to replenishe the same: bicause the plague had bene so extreme among them, & had killed such a number of them, as there was not left aliue the tenth persone of the people that had bene ple into a most bottomles pyt. And are not yet contented to have famished some of the poore cittizens hertofore to death, & to put other of them even to the mercie of the plague:

but a freshe, they have procured a voluntarie warre, to the ende they would leave behind no kynde of miserie and ill, wherewith the poore syllie people should not be plagued, and only bicause they are werie to serue the riche. The common people being set on a broyle

D there before. So the wife men of ROME beganne to thincke, that the necessitie of the VELL-TRIANS fell out in a most happy hower, and howe by this occasion it was very mete in so great a scarsitie of vittailes, to disburden Rome of a great number of cittizens; and by this meanes as well to take awaye this newe fedition, and veterly to ryd it out of the cittie, as also to cleare the same of many mutinous and seditious persones, being the superfluous ill humours that greuously fedde this disease. Hereupon the Consuls prickt out all those by a bill, whom they intended to sende to V E L ITRES, to goe dwell there as in forme velinge media of a colonie: and they leavied out of all the rest that remained in the cittie of Rome, a great acolonie to number to goe against the Volsces, hoping by the meanes of forreine warre, to pacific their sedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the riche, and the totemone the E meane forte with the nobilitie, should by this deuise be abroad in the warres, & in one campe, Rome and in one seruice, and in one like daunger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two feditious Tribunes, spake against either of these deuises, sicinius and and cried out apon the noble men, that vinder the gentle name of a colonie, they would cloke Brane Triand culler the most cruell and vnnaturall facte as might be; bicause they sent their poore cittizens into a fore infected cittie and pestilent ayer, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there both those dealso to dwell under the tuytion of a straunge god, that had so cruelly persecuted his people, wife. This were (faid they) euen as muche, as if the Senate should hedlong cast downe the peoCoriolanus offendesh she people.

and brauerie with these wordes, would not appeare when the Consuls called their names A by a bill, to preft them for the warres, neither would they be fent out to this newe colonie; in fo muche as the Senate knewe not well what to fave, or doe in the matter, Martine then, who was now growen to great credit, and a flowte man befides, and of great reputation with the noblest men of Rome, rose vp, and openly spake against these flattering Tribunes. And for the replenishing of the cittie of VELITRES, he dyd compell those that were chosen, to poe thither, and to departe the cittie, apon great penalties to him that should disobey; but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or constrained . So Martins taking his friendes and followers with him, and fuch as he could by faver wordes intreate to goe with him, dyd ronne certen forreyes into the dominion of the ANTIATES, where he met with great plenty of corne, and had a maruelous great spoyle, as well of cattell, as of men he had R Antiates, and taken prisoners, whom he brought awaye with him, and referued nothing for him felfe. Afbringeth rich terwardes having brought backe againe all his men that went out with him, fafe and founde to Rome, and every man riche and loden with spoyle: then the hometarriers and housedoues that kept Rome still, beganne to repent them that it was not their happe to goe with him. and so enuied both them that had sped so well in this iorney, and also of malice to Martins. they spited to see his credit and estimation increase still more and more, bicause they accompted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortely after this, Martins stoode for the Consulshippe: and the common people fauored his sure, thinking it would be a shame to them to denie, and refuse, the chiefest noble man of bloude, and most worthic persone of ROME, and specially him that had done so great service and good to the common wealth, For C the custome of Rome was at that time, that such as dyd sue for any office, should for certen dayes before be in the market place, only with a poore gowne on their backes, and without any coate vnderneath, to praye the cittizens to remember them at the daye of election; which was thus deuised, either to moue the people the more, by requesting them in suche meane apparell, or els bicause they might shewe them their woundes they had gotten in the warres in the service of the comon wealth, as manifest markes & testimonie of their valliantnes. Now it is not to be thought that the futers went thus lose in a simple gowne in the market place. without any coate vnder it, for feare, and suspition of the common people: for offices of dignitie in the cittie were not then geuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and felling fell out in election of officers, and that the voyces of Il the electours were bought for money. But after corruption had once gotten waye into the clection of offices, it hath ronne from man to man, even to the very fentence of judges, and also emong captaines in the warres: so as in the ende, that only turned common wealther into Kingdomes, by making armes subject to money. Therefore me thinckes he had reason that sayed: he that first made banckets, and gaue money to the common people. was the first that tooke awaye authoritie, and destroyed common wealth. But this pestilence crept in by litle and litle, and dyd secretly winne ground still, continuing a long time in Rome, before it was openly knowen and discouered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the peoples voyces for money, nor that corrupted the sentence of the judges. Howbeit at ATHENS fome holde opinion, that Anguas, the some E Athenian, the Of Anthemion, was the first man that fedde the judges with money, about the ende of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, being accused of treason for yelding vp the force of PYLE, at that time, when the golden and vnfoiled age remained yet whole in judgement at Roms. Now Martius following this custome, shewed many woundes and cuttes apon his bodie, which he had receyued in seuenteene yeres seruice at the warres, and in many fundrie bartells, being euer the formest man that dyd set out feete to fight. So that there was not a man emong the people, but was ashamed of him selfe, to refuse so valliant a man: and one of them fayed to another, we must needes chuse him Consul, there is no remedie. But when the daye of election was come, and that Martius came to the market place with great pompe, accompanied with all the Senate, and the whole Nobilitie of the cittie about F him, who fought to make him Conful, with the greatest instance and intreatie they could,

or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and good will of the common raine authoritie into his handes, being a man somewhat partiall toward the nobilitie, and minder of coof great credit and authoritie amongest the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would mon people. take away alltogether the libertie from the people. Whereupon for these conderations, they refused Martins in the ende, and made two other that were futers, Confuls. The Senate being maruelously offended with the people, dyd accompt the shame of this refusall, rather to redownd to them selves, then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worse parte then the Senate, and was out of all pacience. For he was a man to full of passion and choller, and to muche geuen to ouer felfe will and opinion, as one of a highe minde and great corage, that lacked the grauity, and affabilitie that is gotten with judgment of learning and reason, which only is to B be looked for in a gouernour of state: and that remembred not how wilfulnes is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a comon wealth for pleasing should shone, being that which Plato called solitarines. As in the ende, all men that are wilfully genen to a selfe opinion & ob- The fraince of stinate minde, and who will neuer yeld to others reason, but to their owne: remaine without selfs will and

But then specially they floct about him, and kept him companie, to his muche harme: for they dyd but kyndle and inflame his choller more and more, being forie with him for the iniurie the people offred him, bicause he was their captaine and leader to the warres, that taught them all marihall discipline, and stirred up in them a noble emulation of honour and uer velded in any respect, as one thincking that to ouercome allwayes, and to have the vpper hande in all matters, was a token of inagnanimitie, and of no base and fainte corage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and passioned parte of the harte, much like the matter of an impostume: went home to his house, full fraighted with spite and malice against the

But Martius stan- Coriolanus and ding vp on his feete, dyd somewhat sharpely take vp those, who went about to gratifie the the infolencie people therein: and called them people pleasers, and traitours to the nobilitie. Moreouer he fine people fayed they nourrished against them selves, the naughty seede and cockle, of insolencie and sedition, which had bene fowed and scattered abroade emongest the people, whom they should haue cut of if they had bene wife, and haue preuented their greatnes: and not to their owne E destruction to have suffered the people, to stablishe a magnitrate for them selves, of so great power and authoritie, as that man had, to whom they had graunted it. Who was also to be feared, bicause he obtained what he would, and dyd nothing but what he listed, neither passed for any obedience to the Consuls, but lived in all libertie, acknowledging no superiour to commaund him, sauing the only heades and authours of their faction, whom he called his magistrates. Therefore sayed he, they that gaue counsell, and persuaded that the come should be genen out to the common people gratio, as they vied to doe in citties of GRECE, where the people had more absolute power: dyd but only nourishe their disobedience, which

F they have so ofte resused to goe to the warres, when they were comaunded: neither for their mutinies when they wet with vs, whereby they have rebelled & forfaken their coutrie: neither for their accusations which their flatterers have preferred vnto them, & they have receyved, " and made good against the Senate: but they will rather judge we gene and graunt them this. A as abasing our selues, and standing in searce of them, & glad to flatter them every waye. By this meanes, their disobedience will still growe worse and worse: and they will neuer leave to practife newe fedition, and vprores. Therefore it were a great follie for vs, me thinckes to doein gea, shall I saye more? we should if we were wife, take from them their Tribuneshippe, which " most manifestly is the embasing of the Consulshippe, & the cause of the diussion of the cittie ... The state whereof as it standeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but becommeth dismembred in two factions, which mainteines allwayes civill diffention and discorde between vs , and will " neuer fuffer vs againe to be vnited into one bodie. Martius dilating the matter with many fuch like reasons, wanne all the young men, and almost all the riche men to his opinion: in so much they range it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the cittie, who stoode out against the R people, & neuer flattered them. There were only a fewe olde men that spake against him fearing least some mischief might fall out apon it, as in dede there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being present at this consultation of the Senate, when they fawe that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voyces, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would affemble to faue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ranne on head in tumult together, before whom the wordes that Martius spake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people so stomaked, that euen in that furie they were readie to flye apon the whole Senate. But the Tribunes layed all the faulte and burden wholy vpon Martins, and fent their fergeantes forthwith to arrest him, presently to appeare in persone before the people, to aunswer the wordes he had c spoken in the Senate. Martius stowtely with stoode these officers that came to arrest him. Then the Tribunes in their owne persones, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to setche him by force, and so layed violent hands upon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes geue backe, and layed it fore apon the Ædiles: fo for that time. the night parted them, & the tumult appealed. The next morning betimes, the Confuls feing the people in an vprore, ronning to the market place out of all partes of the cittie, they were affrayed least all the cittie would together by the eares: wherefore affembling the Senate in all hast, they declared how it stoode them vpon, to appeale the furie of the people, with some gentle wordes, or gratefull decrees in their fauour : and moreouer, like wife men they should confider, it was now no time to stande at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for ho-p nour against the communaltie: they being fallen to so great an extremitie, and offering such imminet daunger. Wherefore they were to confider temperately of things, & to deliuer fome present and gentle pacification. The most parte of the Senatours that were present at this counfaill, thought this opinion best, & gaue their consents vnto it. Whereupon the Consuls rifing out of counfaill, went to speake vnto the people as gently as they could, and they dvd pacific their furie & anger, purging the Senate of all the vniustaccusations layed vpon them, and vsed great modestie in persuading them, and also in reprouing the faultes they had committed. And as for the rest, that touched the sale of corne: they promised there should be no difliking offred them in the price. So the most parte of the people being pacified, and appearing so plainely by the great silence and still that was among them, as yelding to the Consuls, E and liking well of their wordes: the Tribunes then of the people rose out of their seates, and fayed. For a fmuche as the Senate yelded vnto reason, the people also for their parte, as became them, dyd likewife geue place vnto them: but notwithstanding, they would that Martins should come in persone to aunswer to the articles they had deuised. First, whether he had not folicited and procured the Senate to chaunge the prefent state of the common weale, and to take the foueraine authoritie out of the peoples handes. Next, when he was fent for by authoritie of their officers, why he dyd contemptuously resist and disobey. Lastely, seeing he had driuen and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the worlde: if in doing this, he had not done as muche as in him laye, to raife civill warres, and to fet one cittizen against another.

All this was spoken to one of these two endes, either that Martins against his nature should F be constrained to humble him selfe, and to abase his hawty and sierce minde: or els if he continued still in his stowtnes, he should incurre the peoples displeasure and ill will so farre, that

A he should never possibly winne them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out so, then otherwise : as in deede they gest vnhappely, considering Martin nature and disposition . So Martius came, and presented him selfe, to aunswer their accusations against him, & the pedple held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would fave . But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly wordes come from him, he beganne not only to vie his wonted boldnes of speaking (which of it selfe was very rough and unpleasaunt, and dvd more aggrauate his acculation, then purge his innocencie) but also gaue him selfe in his confidence wordes to thunder, and looke therewithall fo grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the former in wonderful furious in 8 a third definite of matter. This stirred coales emong the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, & their hate him selfe. and malice grewe fo toward him, that they could holde no lenger, beare, nor indure his bra-R uerv and careles boldnes. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruellest and stowtest of the Tribunes, after he had whifpered a litle with his companions, dyd openly pronounce in the face of all the Tribune, propeople, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to dye. Then prefently he commaunded the nomineath fen-Ædiles to apprehend him, and carie him straight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to cast him hedlong downe the fame. When the Ædiles came to lave handes vpon Martin to doe that they were commaunded, divers of the people them selves thought it to cruell, and violent a dede, The noble men also being muche troubled to see such force and rigour vsed, beganne to crie alowde, helpe Martius: To those that layed handes of him being repulsed, they compassed him in rounde emong them felues, and fome of them holding vp their handes to the people, befought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their wordes, nor crying out could C ought preuaile, the tumulte and hurly burley was so great, vntill suche time as the Tribunes owne friendes and kinsemmen weying with them selues the impossiblenes to conuey Martius to execution, without great flaughter & murder of the nobilitie: dyd perfuade and aduife not to proceede in so violent and extraordinary a sorte, as to put such a man to death, without lawfull processe in lawe, but that they should referre the sentence of his death, to the free voyce of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking him felf a litle, dyd aske the Patricians, for what cause they tooke Martins out of the officers handes that went to doe execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of them selues, so cruelly and wickedly put to death, fo noble and valliant a ROMAINE, as Martius was, and that without lawe or inflice? Well, then fayed Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no mole quarrell or diffention against the peo-D ple for they doe graunt your demaude, that his cause shalbe heard according to the law. Therpleitor they doe graunt your demande, that his caute that be near according to the law. I ner-fore fayed he to Martius, we doe will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third hath days gedaye of our next sitting and affembly here, to make your purgation for such articles as shalbe wen him to obiected against you, that by free voyce the people maye gene sentence apon you as shall sunfyer the please them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were muche pleased they had gotten Martius out of this daunger. In the meane space, before the third day of their next cession came about, the same being kept euery nineth daye continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latin, Nunding: there fell out warre against the Antiates, which gaue fome hope to the nobilitie, that this adiornment would come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them so longe, as that the furie of the people against him would be well E swaged, or veterly forgotten, by reason of the trouble of the warres. But contrarie to expechation, the peace was concluded presently with the ANTIATES, and the people returned again to Rome. Then the Patricians affembled oftentimes together, to confult how they might stande to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occasion to cause the people to mutine againe, and rife against the nobilitie. And there Appius Clodius (one that was taken ever as an heavy enemie to the people) dyd auowe and protest, that they would vtterly abase the authoritie of the Senate, and destroye the common weale, if they would suffer the common people to haue authoritie by voyces to geue judgment against the nobilitie. On thother side againe, the most auncient Senatours,& suche as were geuen to fauour the comon people sayed: that when the people thould fee they had authoritie of life and death in their handes, they would F not be so cruell & fierce, but gentle and civill. More also, that it was not for contempt of nobilitie or the Senate, that they fought to have the authoritie of inflice in their handes, as a preheminence and prerogatiue of honour: but bicause they feared, that them selues should be contemned and hated of the nobilitie. So as they were perfuaded, that fo fone as they gave A them authoritie to judge by voyces: fo fone would they leave all envie and malice to condemne anye. Martino leeing the Senate in great doubt how to resolue, partely for the lone and good will the nobilitie dyd beare him, and partely for the feare they stoode in of the people: asked alowde of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden him with ? The Tribunes auniwered him, that they would shewe howe he dyd aspire to be King, and would proue that all his actions tended to viurpe tyrannicall power ouer Rome. Martins with that, rifing vp on his feete, fayed: that thereupon he dyd willingly offer him felf to the people, to be tried apon that accuration. And that if it were proued by him, he had so mucheas once thought of any suche matter, that he would then resule no kinde of punishment they would offer him: conditionally (q. he) that you charge me with nothing els besides, and that B ye doe not also abuse the Senate. They promised they would not. Vinder these conditions the judgement was agreed vpon, and the people affembled. And first of all the Tribunes would in any case (whatsoeuer became of it) that the people would proceede to geue their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needy people (and all fuche rable as had nothing to lofe, and had leffe regard of honeftie before their eves) came to be of greater force(bicaule their voyces were numbred by the polle) then the noble honest cittizens, whose persones and purse dyd duetifully serue the common wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes fawe they could not proue he went about to make him felf King: they beganne to broache a freshe the former wordes that Martius had spoken in the Senate, in hindering the distribution of the corne at meane price vnto the common people, c and persuading also to take the office of Tribuneshippe from them. And for the third, they charged him a newe, that he had not made the common distribution of the spoyle he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iorney. But this matter was most straunge of all to Martius, looking least to have bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Where upon being burdened on the fodaine, and having no ready excuse to make even at that instant: he beganne to fall a praising of the fouldiers that had served with him in that jorney.

But those that were not with him, being the greater number, cried out so lowde, and made determined to have done & fuffered any thing whatfoeuer, before the comon people should fo arrogantly, and outrageously have abused their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrat you, nor outward showes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were easely decerned by their lookes. For he that was on the peoples side, looked cheerely on the matter: but he that was fad, and honge downe his head, he was fure of the noble mens fide.

fuche a noyfe, that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odde, which condemned him to be banished for life. Af D banished for ter declaration of the fentence, the people made fuche joye, as they never rejoyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were to braue and lively, & went home to iocondly from the affembly, for triumphe of this sentece. The Senate agains in contrary manner were as fad and heavie, repenting them felues beyond measure, that they had not rather

Sauing Martins alone, who neither in his countenaunce, nor in his gate, dyd euer showe him E felfe abashed, or once let fall his great corage: but he only of all other gentlemen that were angrie at his fortune, dyd outwardly shewe no manner of passion, nor care at all of him selfe. Not that he dyd paciently beare and temper his good happe, in respect of any reason he had, or by his quiet condition: but bicause he was so caried awaye with the vehemencie of anger, and defire of reuenge, that he had no fence nor feeling of the hard state he was in, which the common people judge, not to be forow, although in dede it be the very fame. For when forow (as you would faye) is fet a fyre, then it is converted into spite and malice, and driveth awaye for that time all faintnes of harte and naturall feare. And this is the cause why the chollericke man is fo altered, and mad in his actions, as a man fet a fyre with a burning agewe: for when a mans harte is troubled within, his pulse will beate maruelous strongely. Now that F Martine was even in that taking, it appeared true sone after by his doinges. For when he was come home to his house againe, and had taken his leave of his mother and wife, finding them

A weeping, and shreeking out for forrowe, and had also comforted and persuaded them to be content with his chaunce: he went immediatly to the gate of the cittie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians that brought him thither, from whence he went on his wave with three or foure of his friendes only taking nothing with him, nor requesting any thing of any man. So he remained a fewe dayes in the countrie at his houses, turmoyled with sundry fortes and kynde of thoughtes, fuche as the fyer of his choller dyd sturre vp . In the ende, seeing he could resolue no waye, to take a profitable or honorable course, but only was pricked forward Hill to be reueged of the ROMAINES: he thought to raise up some great warres against them. by their neerest neighbours. Whereupon, he thought it his best waye, first to stirre vp the VOLSCES against them, knowing they were yet able enough in strength and riches to en-B counter them, not with standing their former losses they had receyued not long before, & that their power was not so muche impaired, as their malice and desire was increased, to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the cittie of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Aufi-diss, who for his riches, as also for his nobilitie and valliantnes, was honoured emong the Tullus Ans. VOLSCES as a King. Martius knewe very well, that Tullus dyd more malice and enuie him, dius, agrase then he dyd all the ROMAINES besides: bicause that many times in battells where they met, the Vollege, they were euer at the encounter one against another, like lustic coragious youthes, striuing in all emulation of honour, and had encountered many times together. In so muche, as besides the common quarrell betweene them, there was bred a maruelous private hate one against another. Yet notwithstanding, considering that Tullus Aufidius was a man of a great minde, C and that he aboue all other of the Volsces, most desired revenge of the ROMAINES, for the injuries they had done vnto them: he dyd an acte that confirmed the true wordes of an auncient Poet, who fayed: It is a thing full harde, mans anger to withstand, if it be stiffely bent to take an enterprise in hande. For then most men will have, the thing that they defire, although it soft their lines therefore, suche force hath wwicked ire.

And so dyd he, For he dilguised him selse in suche arraye and attire, as he thought no man could ever have knowen him for the persone he was seeing him in that apparell he had your his backe : and as Homer fayed of Vlyffes,

So dyd he enter into the enemies towwne.

It was even twy light when he entred the cittie of ANTIVM, and many people met him in the streetes, but no man knewe him. So he went directly to Tullus Aufidius house, and when discussed. he came thither he got him up straight to the chimney harthe, and fat him downe, and spake gother Annot a worde to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the house spying him, wondered of the Vusces wheeh of houself he and the state of the Vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces with the second of the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheeh of houself he are they during the vusces wheel he are the vusces wheel he are the vusces wheel he are the vusces where they do not the vusces wheel he are the vusces wheel he are the vusces wheel he are the vusces where t what he should be, and yet they durst not byd him rise. For ill fauoredly mustled and disguised as he was yet there appeared a certaine maiestie in his countenance, and in his filence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at supper to tell him of the straunge disguising of this man. Tullus role presently from the borde, and comming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled him felfe, and after he had paufed a while, ma-

Tulbus hearing what he fayed, was a maruelous glad man, and taking him by the hande, he fayed vnto him. So he feasted him for that time, and entertained him in the honorablest manner he could, talking with him in no other matters at that present: but within fewe dayes after, they fell to consultation together, in what forte they should beginne their warres. Now on thother side, the cittie of Rome was in Great differ. maruelous vorore, and discord, the nobilitie against the communaltie, and chiefly for Martin condemnation and banishment. Moreover the priestes, the Soothesayers, and private men also, came and declared to the Senate certaine fightes and wonders in the ayer, which they had seene, and were to be considered of : amongest the which, such a vision happened . There was a cittizen of Rome called Titus Latinus, a man of meane qualitie & condition, but otherwife an honest sober manageuen to a quier life, without superstition, and much lesse to vanitie of orlying. This man had a vision in his dreame, in the which he thought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commaunded him to fignifie to the Senate, that they had caused a very vile lewde daunser to goe before the procession; and saved, the first time this vision had appeared vnto him, he made no reckoning of it: and comming againe another time into his minde, he made not muche more accompt of the matter then before. In the ende, he fawe one of his fonnes dye, who had the best nature and condition of all his brethern; and sodainely he him felfe was fo taken in all his limmes, that he became lame and impotent. Hereupon he tolde the whole circumstace of this vision before the Senate, sitting upon his litle couche or bedde, whereon he was caried on mens armes: and he had no fooner reported this vision to the Senate, but he prefently felt his bodie & limmes reftored again, to their former street h & vse. So n raising up him self upon his couche, he got up on his seete at that instant, & walked home to his house, without helpe of anyman. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent enquierie to vinderstand the trothe: & in the ende they found there was such a thing. There was one that had deliuered a bodman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other flaues & bondemen, & had commanded them to whippe him vp & down the market place, & afterwards to kill him: & as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they dyd fo martyre the poore wretch, that for the cruell fmarte & payne he felt, he turned & writhed his bodie in strauge & pittiefull forte. The procession by chaunce came by euen at the same time, & many that followed it, were hartely moued & offended with the fight, faying; that this was no good fight to behold, nor mete to be met in processio time. But for all this, there was nothing done fauing they blamed & rebuked him, that punished his flaue so cruelly. For the Romainess that time, dyd vse their bondemen very gently, bicause they them selues dyd labour with their owne hands, and lived with them, & emong them: and therefore they dyd vie them the more gently and familliarly. For the greatest punishment they gaue a slaue that had offended, was this. They made him carie a limmer on his showlders that is fastened to the axeltree of a coche, and compelled him to goe vp and downe in that forte amongest all their neighbours. He that had once abidden this punishement, and was seene in that manner, was proclaimed and cried in euery market towne: so that no man would euer trust him after, and they called him Furcifer, bicause the LATINES call the wood that ronneth into the axeltree of the coche, Furea, as muche to faye, as a forke. Now when Latinus had made reporte to the Senate of the F vision that had happened to him, they were deuising whom this vnpleasaunt daunser should be that went before the procession. Thereupon certain that stoode by remembred the poore

A flane that was so cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwardes put to death: and the thing that made them remember it, was the straunge and rare manner of his nunishment. The priestes hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduise: they were wholy of opinion, that it was the whipping of the flaue. So they caused the flaues master to be punished. and beganne againe a newe procession, and all other showes and sightes in honour of Jupiter. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa dyd wifely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the goddes, and specially this custome which he stablished, to bring the instituted by king Numa.

R wholy to dispose them selves to serve God, leaving all other busines and matters a side: know-images of their goddes, and fuche other like holy relikes ypon open hallowed coches or chardrawe no more: and bicause also the coche man tooke the raynes of the bridle with the left hande, they ordained that the procession should be begonne againe a newe. Of later time also, they dyd renewe and beginne a facrifice thirtie times one after another, bicause they thought still there fell out one faulte or other in the same, so holy and deuout were they to the goddes.

Now Tullus and Martius had secret conference with the greatest personages of the cittie of

ANTIVM, declaring vnto them, that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the Romaine s, while they were in diffention one with another. They aunswered them, they were ashamed to breake the league, considering that they were sworne to keepe peace should anoyde out of Rome before sunne set. Some thincke this was a crafte and deceipt of people to religion. For when the magistrates, bishoppes, priestes, or other religious ministers southing religoe about any divine feruice, or matter of religion, an herauld ever goeth before them, crying gion. out alowde, Hot age: as to faye, doe this, or minde this. Hereby they are specially comaunded, ing well enough, that what societ most men doe, they doe it as in a manner constrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES dyd euer vie to beginne againe their facrifices, processions, playes, and The Georgie fuche like thowes done in honour of the goddes, not only vpon fuche an occasion, but apon tion of the lighter causes then that. As when they went a procession through the cittie, and dyd carie the Remaines, Martius, who fent one to Rome to the Confuls, to accuse the Volsces fallely, aduertising Marine Co-

D them howe they had made a conspiracie to set apon them, whilest they were busic in seeing these games, and also to set their cittie a fyre. This open proclamation made all the Vols ces of the Volses. more offended with the ROMAINES, then ever they were before: and Tullus agravating the matter, dyd so inflame the Volsces against them, that in the ende they sent their ambassadours to Rome, to furnimone them to deliuer their landes and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times past, or to looke for present warres. The ROMAINES hearing this. were maruelously netled : and made no other aunswer but thus. If the Voisces be the first that beginne warre: the ROMAINES will be the last that will ende it. Incontinently upon returne of the Volsces ambassadours, and deliverie of the Romaines aunswer: Tullus caufedan affembly generall to be made of the Volsces, and concluded to make warre apon the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus dyd counsell them to take Martins into their service, and not to miltrust him for the remembraunce of any thing past, but boldely to trust him in any matter to come: for he would doe them more feruice in fighting for them, then ever he dyd them displeasure in fighting against them . So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lesse eloquent in tongue, then warlike in showe: and declared him selfe both expert in warres, and wife with valliantnes. Thus he coriolanus was joyned in commission with Tullus as generall of the Volsces, having absolute authoritie betwene the to follow & pursue the warres. But Martins fearing least tract of time to bring Volfces, with this armie togither with all the munitio & furniture of the Volsces, would robbe him of the Tullus Aufmeane he had to execute his purpose and intent: left order with the rulers and chief of the the Romaines.

Then he with the lightest fouldiers he had, and that were willing to followe him, state awaye insudant the vpon the fodaine, and marched with all speede, and entred the territories of Rome, before the the Romaines. ROMAINES heard any newes of his comming. In fo much the Voiscas found fuch spoyle A in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, and were wearie to drine and carie awaye that they had. Howbeit the gayne of the spoyle and the hurte they dyd to the ROMAINES in this inuation, was the least parte of his intent. For his chiefest purpose was, to A fine desisse increase still the malice and dissention betweene the nobilitie, and the communaltie: and to drawe that on, he was very carefull to keepe the noble mens landes & goods fafe from harme and burning, but spoyled all the whole countrie besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurte any thing of the noble mens. This made greater sturre and broyle betweene the nobilitie and people, then was before. For the noble men fell out with the people, bicause they had fo vniustly banished a man of so great valure and power. The people on thother side, accused the nobilitie, how they had procured Martins to make these warres, to be reuenged of them: R bicause it pleased them to see their goodes burnt and spoyled before their eyes, whilest them felues were well at ease, and dyd behold the peoples losses and misfortunes, & knowing their owne goodes fafe and out of daunger: and howe the warre was not made against the noble men, that had the enemie abroad, to keepe that they had in fafety. Now Martius having done this first exploite (which made the Volsces bolder, and lesse fearefull of the ROMAINES) brought home all the armie againe, without losse of any man, After their whole armie (which was maruelous great, and very forward to feruice) was affembled in one campe: they agreed to leave parte of it for garrison in the countrie about, and the other parte should goe on, and make the warre apon the Romaines. So Martin bad Tullus choose, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him aunswer, he knewe by experience that Martin C was no leffe valliant then him felfe, and howe he euer had better fortune and good happe in all battells, then him felfe had. Therefore he thought it best for him to have the leading of those that should make the warres abroade: and him selfe would keepe home, to prouide for the fafety of the citties and of his countrie, and to furnishe the campe also of all necessary prouision abroade. So Martius being stronger then before, went first of all vnto the cittie of Cin-CEES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yelded them selues, and therefore had no hurte. From thence, he entred the countrie of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there, to defend the LATINES, who were their confederates, and had many times fent vnto the Romaines for their ayde. But on the one fide, the people of Rome were very ill willing to goe: and on the other fide the Confuls being apon their going out of their D office, would not hazard them selues for so small a time: so that the ambassadours of the La-TINES returned home againe, and dyd no good. Then Martius dyd besiege their citties, and having taken by force the townes of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDA NIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made refistaunce: he sacked all their goodes, and tooke them prisoners. Suche as dyd yeld them selues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as possible might be to defend them from hurte: and bicause they should recevue no damage by his will he removed his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the cittie of Boles by affault, being about an hundred furlonge from Rome, where he had a maruelous great spoyle, and put every man to the sword that was able to carie weapon. The other Volsces that were appointed to remaine in garrifon for defence of their countrie, hearing E this good newes, would tary no lenger at home, but armed them felues, and ranne to Martin campe, saying they dyd acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his same ranne through all ITALIE, and every one praised him for a valliant captaine, for that by chaunge of one man for another, suche and so straunge euents fell out in the state. In this while, all went fill to wracke at ROME. For , to come into the field to fight with the enemie, they could not abyde to heare of it, they were one so much against another, and full of seditious wordes, the nobilitie against the people, & the people against the nobilitie. Vntill they had intelligence at the length that the enemies had layed seige to the cittle of LAVINIVM, in the which were all the temples and images of the goddes their protectours, and from whence came first their auncient originall, for that Aneas at his first arrivall into ITALIE dyd build that cittle. Then I fell there out a maruelous fodain chaunge of minde among the people, & farre more straunge & contrarie in the nobilitie. For the people thought good to repeale the condemnation and

A exile of Martins. The Senate affembled upon it, would in no case yeld to that. Who either dvd it of a selfe will to be contrarie to the peoples defire: or bicause Martine should not returnethrough the grace and fauour of the people. Or els, bicause they were throughly angrie and offended with him, that he would fet apon the whole, being offended but by a fewer and in his doings would showe him selfe an open enemie besides you his countrie; notwithstanding the most parte of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruelous ill parte, and as if the injurie had bene done vnto them felues. Reporte being made of the Senates resolution, the people founde them selves in a straight: for they could authorise and confirme nothing by their voyces, vnles it had bene first propounded and ordeined by the Senate. But Martius hearing this sturre about him, was in a greater rage with them then be-R fore: in so muche as he raised his seige incontinently before the citie of LAVINIVM. and going towardes Rome, lodged his campe within fortie furlonge of the cittie, at the ditches called Cluilia. His incamping so neere Rome, dyd put all the whole cittie in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the present time it appealed the sedition and dissention betweet the Nobilitie and the people. For there was no Conful, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrarie the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they fawe the women in a maruelous feare, ronning vp and downe the cittie: the temples of the goddes full of olde people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the goddes; and finally, not a man either wife or hardie to prouide for their fafetie: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reason to call home Martins againe, to reconcile them selves C to him, and that the Senate on the contrary parte, were in maruelous great faulte to be angrie and in choller with him, when it stoode them vpon rather to have gone out and intreated him. So they all agreed together to fend ambassadours vnto him, to let him vn- The Romei. derstand howe his countrymen dyd call him home againe, and restored him to all his nes fend amgoodes, and befought him to deliver them from this warre. The ambassadours that were Coriolanus in fent were Martine familliar friendes, and acquaintaunce, who looked at the least for a cur- trease of teous welcome of him, as of their familliar friende and kynfeman. Howbeit they founde peace. nothing leffe. For at their comming, they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was fer in his chayer of state, with a maruelous and an vnspeakable maiestic. having the chiefest men of the V o L S CES about him: so he commaunded them to de-D clare openly the cause of their comming. Which they delivered in the most humble and lowly wordes they possiblie could deuise, and with all modest countenaunce and behaulour agreable for the fame. When they had done their message : for the injurie they haddone him, he aunswered them very hottely, and in great choller. But as generall of the Volsces, he willed them to reftore vnto the Volsces, all their landes and citties they had taken from them in former warres: and moreover, that they should geue them the like honour and freedome of Rome, as they had before gener to the LATINES. For otherwife they had no other meane to ende this warre, if they dyd not graunte these honest and just conditions of peace. Thereupon he gave them thirtie dayes respit to make him aunswer. So the ambassadours returned straight to Rome, and Martius forthwith departed with his armie out of the territories of the ROMAINES. This was the first matter wherewith the Volschs (that most enuied Martins glorie and authoritie) dyd charge The first oc-Martius with Among those Tallus was chief: who though he had received no private case of the iniurie or displeasure of Martins, yet the common faulte and impersection of mans na- Volscus emos ture wrought in him, and it grieued him to fee his owne reputation bleamished, through Martius great fame and honour, and so him selfe to be lesse esteemed of the Vo 1s c a s, then he was before. This fell out the more, bicause every man honoured Martius, and thought he only could doe all, and that all other governours and captaines must be content with suche credit and authoritie, as he would please to countenaunce them with . From hence they derived all their first accusations and secret murmurings Fagainst Martius. For prinate captaines conspiring against him, were very angrie with him: and gaue it out, that the remouing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor forces, nor of armes, but of time and occasion, which was a losse of great CORIOLANVS. 254 importaunce, bicaufe it was that which in treason might both lose and binde all, and pre-s ferue the whole . Now Martius having geuen the ROMAINES thirtie dayes refin for their aunswer, and specially bicause the warres have not accustomed to make any great chaunges, in lesse space of time then that : he thought it good yet, not to lve a fleepe and idle all the while, but went and destroyed the landes of the enemies allies, and tooke feuen great citties of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMAINES durft nor once put them selues into the field, to come to their ayde and helpe: they were so fainte harted, fo mistrustfull, and lothe besides to make warres. In so muche as there properly reflembled the bodyes paralyticke, and losed of their limmes and members as those which through the palsey have lost all their sence and feeling. Wherefore the time of peace expired, Martins being returned into the dominions of the Romains againe with all his armie, they fent another ambassade vnto him, to praye peace, and the remoue of the V o is c a s out of their countrie: that afterwardes they might with better levfure fall to suche agreementes together, as should be thought most mete and necessarie. For the Romaines were no men that would ever yeld for feare. But if he thought the V o L S C E S had any grounde to demaunde reasonable articles and conditions, all that they would reasonably aske should be graunted vnto, by the Roman NES, who of them felues would willingly yeld to reason, conditionally, that they dyd laye downe armes. Martius to that auniwered : that as generall of the Voisceshe awould replie nothing vnto it. But yet as a ROMAINE cittizen, he would counfell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they C should returne againe within three dayes, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he had first deliuered them. Or otherwise, that he would no more gene them affuraunce or fafe conduite to returne againe into his campe, with fuche vaine and friuolous messages. When the ambassadours were returned to Rome, and had reported Martius aunswer to the Senate: their cittie being in extreme daunger', and as it were in a terrible storme or tempest, they threw out (as the common prouerbe fayeth) their how ancker. For then they appointed all the bishoppes, priestes, ministers of the goddes, and keepers of holy things, and all the augures or foothefayers, which foreshowe things to come by observation of the flying of birdes (which is an olde auncient kynde of prophecying and divination amongest the Romaines) to goe to Martius apparelled D as when they doe their facrifices : and first to intreate him to leave of warre, and then the he would speake to his contrymen, and conclude peace with the V o 18 C #8. Martin fuffered them to come into his campe, but yet he graunted them nothing the more neither dyd he entertaine them or speake more curteously to them, then he dyd the first time that they came vnto him, fauing only that he willed them to take the one of the two: either to accept peace vnder the first conditions offered, or els to receybe warre. When all this goodly rable of fuperstition and priestes were returned, it was determined in counsell that none should goe out of the gates of the cittie, and that they should watche and warde vpon the walles, to repulse their enemies if they came to affault them: referring them felues and all their hope to time, and fortunes has be vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwise howe to remedie the daunger. Now all the cittie was full of tumult; feare, and maruelous doubt what would happen: vntill at the length there fell ongi out fuche a like matter, as Homer oftetimes าสส fayed they would least haue thought 101 of. For in great matters, that happen feldome, Homer fayeth, and crieth out in this forte. 1021

The goddesse Pallas she, with her fayer glistering eyes. dyd put into his minde suche thoughts, and made him so deuise. A And in an other place:

But fure some god hath t'ane, out of the peoples minde, both wvit and understanding eke and have therewvith asynde Some other simple spirite in Reede thereof to byde. that so they might their doings all for lacke of wis misguyde.

And in an other place:

Many recken not of Homer, as referring matters unpossible, and fables of no likelyhoode ortrothe, vnto mans reason, free will, or judgement: which in deede is not his meaning. But B things true & likely, he maketh to depend of our owne free wil and reason. For he oft speaketh these wordes:

I have thought it in my noble harte.

And in an other place:

Achilles angrie vvas, and sorie for to heare bim fo to fay, his heavy breft wwas fraught weith penfine feare.

And againe in an other place:

Bellerophon(she) could not move with her fager tongue, fo honest and so vertuous, he was the rest ambig.

But in wonderous and extraordinarie thinges, which are done by secret inspirations and C motions, hedoth not say that God taketh away, from man his choyce and freedom of will, but that he doth moue it : neither that he doth worke desire in vs, but objecteth to our mindes certaine imaginations whereby we are lead to defire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For, either we must say, that the goddes meddle not with the causes and beginninges of our actions: or elsewhat other meanes have they to helpe and further men? It is apparaunt that they handle not our bodies, nor moue not our feete and handes, when there is occasion to vie them: but that parte of our minde from which these motions proceede, is induced thereto, or caried away by fuch objectes and reasons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the Romaine Ladies and gentlewomen did vifite all the temples and goddes D of the same, to make their prayers vnto them : but the greatest Ladies (and more parte of them) were continuallie about the aulter of Impiter Capitolin, emonge which troupe by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes owne fifter. The felfe fame Publicola, who did fuch notable feruice to the ROMAINES, both in peace & warres: and was dead also certaine yeares before, as we have declared in his life. His fifter Valeria was greatly honoured and reverenced a- Valeria Ph. monge all the ROMAINES : and did so modestlie and wiselie behaue her selfe, that she did blicolate not shame nor dishonour the house she came of . Whereuppon (herose, and thother Ladies with her, and they all together went straight to the house of Volumnia, Martius mother: and comming in to her, founde her, and Martius Volumnia, E wife her daughter in lawe ser together, and hauinge her husbande Martius young children Marius moin her lappe. "When Valeria had spoken this vnto them, all thother ladges together with one voyce con-

My good ladies, twe R are partakers with you of the common miserie and calamitie of our countrie, and vetous griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reason of our particular missortune: to feele the losse of my sonne Martius former valiancie and glorie, and to see his persone enuiron ed nowe " with our enemies in armes, rather to see him foorth comminge and safe kept, then of any ", loue to defende his persone. But yet the greatest griefe of our heaped mishappes is, to see ,, our poore countrie brought to such extremitie, that all the hope of the safetie and pre-» feruation thereof, is nowe vnfortunately cast vppon vs simple women: bicause we know " not what accompt he will make of vs, sence he hath cast from him all care of his natu-" rall countrie and common weale, which heretofore he hath holden more decreand pre-" cious, then either his mother, wife, or children. Notwithstandinge, if ye thinke we can o doe good, we will willingly doe what you will hauevs : bringe vs to him I pray you. For if we can not preuaile, we maye yet dye at his feete, as humble futers for the fafetie of our countrie. Her aunswere ended, the tooke her daughter in lawe, and Martius children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE ladies, they went in troupe together vnto the Voisces campe: whome when they fawe, they of them selues did both pine and reuerence her, and there was not a man amonge them that once durft fay a worde you her. Nowe was Martin fet then in his chayer of state, with all the honours of a generall. and when he had spied the women comming a farre of, he marueled what the matter ment but afterwardes knowing his wife which came formest, he determined at the first to perfish in his obstinate and inflexible rancker. But ouercomen in the ende with naturall affection, D and being altogether altered to see them: his harte would not serue him to tarie their comming to his chayer, but comming downe in hast, he went to meete them, and first he kiffed his mother, and imbraced her a pretie while, then his wife and litle children. And nature to wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he coulde not keepe him felfe from making much of them, but yeelded to the affection of his bloode, as if he had bene violently carried with the furie of a most swift running streame. After he had thus louingly received them, and perceivinge that his mother Volumnia would beginne to speake to him, he called the chiefest of the counsell of the Volsces to heare what she would fay. Then the spake in this force. If we helde our peace (my sonne) and determined not to speake, the state of our poore bodies, and present sight of our rayment, would easely be wray to thee what life we have led at home, fince thy exile and abode abroad. But thinke now

For some misliked him, and that he had withdraweth done. Other being well pleased that peace should be made, sayed: that neither the one, nor form Rome. the other, deserved blame nor reproche. Other, though they misliked that was done, dyd not thincke him an ill man for that he dyd, but fayed: he was not to be blamed, though he yelded to suche a forcible extremitie. Now the cittizens of Rome plainely shewed, in what feare and daunger their cittie " thy wife & children, to forgoe the one of the two: either to lose the persone of thy selfe, or the stoode of this warre, when they were deliuered. For so sone as the watche vpon the walles of the cittle perceyued the Volsces campe to remoue, there was not a temple in the cittle but

And I maye not deferre to see the " dave, either that my sonne be led prisoner in triumphe by his naturall country men, or that he a him selfe doe triumphe of them, and of his naturall countrie. For if it were so, that my request " tended to faue thy countrie, in destroying the Volses: I must cofesse, thou wouldest hardly " and doubtfully resolue on that. For as to destroye thy naturall countrie, it is altogether vnmete a and vnlawfull: so were it not iust, and lesse honorable, to betraye those that put their trust in " R thee. But my only demaunde confifteth, to make a gayle deliuerie of all euills, which deliuereth equall benefit and fafety, both to the one and the other, but most honorable for the Voi- " sces. Hereupon she beganne againe to speake vnto him, and fayed. My fonne, why doest thou not aunswer me ? doest thou thinke it good altogether . to geue place vnto thy choller and defire of reuenge, and thinkest thou it not honestie for thee " to graunt thy mothers request, in so weighty a cause? does thou take it honorable for a no-

No man " liuing is more bounde to shewe him selfe thankefull in all partes and respects, then thy selfe: " who so vnnaturally sheweth all ingratitude. Moreouer (my sonne) thou hast forely taken of thy countrie, exacting grieuous payments apon them, in reuenge of the injuries offered thee: be- " sides, thou hast not hitherto shewed thy poore mother any curtesie. And therefore, it is not only honest, but due vnto me, that without compulsion I should obtaine my so just and reasona- " ble request of thee. But since by reason I cannot persuade thee to it, to what purpose doe I de- " ferre my last hope? And with these wordes, her selfe, his wife and children, fell downe vpon " their knees before him. Martius seeing that, could refraine no lenger, but went straight and e lifte her vp, crying out: Oh mother, what have you done to me? And holding her hard by the coriolans right hande, oh mother, fayed he, you have wonne a happy victorie for your countrie; but tomposition of his matter, mortall and vnhappy for your sonne: for I see my self vanquished by you alone. the ROMAINES fave dyd speake as they offred her vp in the temple, and dyd fet her in her and tokens it is not amiffe we thincke, that the goddes formetimes doe warne men of things C. to come. And it is possible also, that these images and statues doe somtimes put forth soundes, like vnto fighes or mourning, when in the middest or bottome of the same, there is made fome violent separation, or breaking a fonder of things, blowen or deuised therein : but that a bodie which hath neither life nor foule, should have any direct or exquisite worde formed in it by expresse voyce, that is altogether vnpossible. For the soule, nor god him selfe can distinctly speake without a bodie, having necessarie organes and instrumentes mete for the partes of the same to forme and vtter distinct wordes. But where stories many times doe force ys to beleeue a thing reported to be true, by many graue testimonies: there we must fave. that it is some passion contrarie to our fine naturall sences, which being begotten in the imaginatiue parte or vnderstanding, draweth an opinion vnto it selfe, euen as we doe in our slee D ping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we doe not heare: and we imagine we fee, that we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously genen to thinke apon heauenly things, so as they can no waye be drawen from beleeuing that which is spoken of them, they have this reason to grounde the foundation of their beleefe vpon. That is, the omnipotencie of God which is wonderfull, and hath no manner of refemblaunce or like-lines of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrarie as touching our nature, our mo-

uing, our arte, and our force: and therefore if he doe anything vnpoffible to vs, or doe bring forth and deuise things, without mans common reache and vnderstanding, we must not therefore thinke it vnpossible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrarie to vs. muche more in his workes and secret operations, he farre passeth all the rest: but the most E parte of goddes doings, as Heraelitus fayeth, for lacke of faith, are hidden and vnknowen ynto ys. Now when Marting was returned againe into the cittle of Antivm from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no lenger abide him for the feare he had of his authoritie: fought divers meanes to make him out of the waye, thinking that if he let flippe that dius Ceekesh to kill Coriepresent time, he should neuer recouer the like and fit occasion againe. Wherefore Tullus having procured many other of his confederacy, required Martins might be deposed from his estate, to render vp accompt to the Volsces of his charge and gouernment, Martin fearing to become a private man againe vnder Tullus being generall (whose authoritie was greater otherwise, then any other emong all the Volsces) aunswered: he was willing to geue vp his charge, and would refigne it into the handes of the lordes of the Volsces, if F they dyd all commaund him, as by all their commaundement he receyued it. And moreouer, that he would not refuse euen at that present to geue vp an accompt vnto the people, a if they would rarie the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counfaill, in which affembly there were certen oratours appointed, that stirred up the common people against him : and when they had tolde their tales, Martius rose vp to make them aunswer. Now notwithstanding the mutinous people made a maruelous great nove vet when they fawe him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valliantnes, they quieted them felues, and gaue fillaudience to alledge with levfure what he could for his purgation. Moreover, the honeftest men of the ANTIATES, and who most rejoyced in peace, shewed by their countenaunce that they would heare him willingly, and judge also according to their conscience. Whereunon Tullus fearing that if he dyd let him speake, he would proue his innocencie to the people. bicause emongest other things he had an eloquent tongue, besides that the first good service R he had done to the people of the Volses, dyd winne him more fauour, then these last accusations could purchase him displeasure; and furthermore, the offence they layed to his charge, was a testimonie of the good will they ought him, for they would never have thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the cittle of Rome, if they had not bene very neere taking of it, by meanes of his approache and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no lenger delaye his pretence and enterprise, neither to tarie for the murining and rifing of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracie, beganne to crie out that he was not to be heard, nor that they would not suffer a traytour to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the Volsces, who would not yeld vp his effate and authoritie, And in faving these wordes, they all fell you him, and killed him in Coriclanae the market place, none of the people once offering to refcue him. Howbeit it is a clere cafe; madded in that this murder was not generally confented vnto, of the most parte of the Voisces: for Antium of Antium of the Voisces: men came out of all partes to honour his bodie, and dyd honorably burie him, fetting out Coviolanus his tombe with great store of armour and spoyles, as the tombe of a worthie persone and funeralles. great captaine. The ROMAINES understanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, fauing that they graunted the ladyes the request they made: that they might mourne tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they yied to weare blackes for the death. The time of of their fathers, brethern, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who stablished mourning apthe fame, as we have enlarged more amplie in the description of his life. Now Martius being Nama. dead, the whole state of the Volsces hartely wished him aliue againe. For first of all they fell n out with the Æ QVES (who were their friendes and confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrell grew on fo farre betwene them, that frayes and murders fell out apon it one with another. After that, the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was flaine in the field, and the flower of all their force was put to the fworde: fo that they were compelled to accept most shamefull conditions of peace, in yelding them felues fubiect vnto the conquerers, & promising to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF AL-

cibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

The acts done

OW that we have written all the dedes of worthie memorie, done A by either of them both: we maye prefently difcerne, that in matters of warre, the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were a like hardie & valliant for their persones. as also wise and politike in the warres: vnles they will saye, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battells with his enemies, both by fea and lande, then ever Coriolanus had done, and had allwayes the victorie of his enemies. For otherwife, in this they were much a like: that where they were both present& had charge and power to commaund, all things prospered notably, and with good successe on the parte they were of: and also when they tooke the contrary side, they made the first haue the B worse enery waye. Now for matters of gouernment, the noble men and honest cittizens dyd hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man most dissolute, and geuen to flatterie: bicause he euer studied by all deuise he could, to currie fauour with the common people. So dyd the Romaine s malice also Coriolanus gouernment, for that it was to arrogant. prowde, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding, he is lesse to be blamed, that seeketh to please and gratifie his common people: then he that despiseth and disdaineth them, and therefore offereth them wrong and injurie, bicause he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credit: euen fo is it besides dithonesty, and injuflice also, to atteine to credit and authoritie, for one to make him selfe terrible to the people, by C offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was ever counted an honest natured man, plaine and fimple, without arte or cunning: Howbeit Alcibiades merely contrarie, for he was fine, subtill, and deceiptfull. And the greatest faulte they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceipt, wherewith he abused the ambassadours of the LACED EMO-NIANS, & that he was a let that peace was not cocluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this acte he fodainly brought the cittie of Athens into warres, yet he brought it thereby of Milionaus, to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the Man-TINIANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practife entred into league with the ATHE-NIANS. And Martius, as Dionysius the historiographer writeth: dyd by craft and deceipt bring the Romaines into warres against the Volsces, causing the Volsces maliciously, and D wrongfully to be suspected, that went to Rome to see the games played. But the cause why he dyd it, made the fact fo much more fowle and wicked. For it was not done for any civill diffention, nor for any ielouzy and contention in matters of gouernment, as Alcibiades dyd: but only following his cholerike moode, that would be pleafed with no thing, as Dion fayed, he

A would needes trouble and turmoile the most parte of ITALIE, and so being eangrie with his countrie, he destroyed many other townes and cities that could not helpe it, nor doe with all. This is true also, that Alcibiades spite and malice did worke great mischiese and miserie to his countrie: but when he faw they repented them of the injurie they had done him, he came to him selfe, and did withdrawe his armie. An other time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet fuffer the captaines of the ATHENTANS to runne into great errours, neither would he see them cast away, by followinge ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forfake them in any daunger they put them felues into . But he did the very fame that Arestides had done in olde time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then and is vet so greatly praised. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the armie of the A-B THENIAMS, although they were not his friendes, and tolde them wherein they did amiffe, and what they had further to doe . Where Martins to the contrarie, did first great hurtelynto the whole citie of Rome, though all in Rome had not generally offended him: yea; and when the best and chiefest parte of the citie were grieued for his sake, and were very sorie and angrie. for the injurie done him. Furthermore, the ROMAINES fought to appeal one onely difplease fure and despite they had done him, by many ambassades, petitions and requestes they made, whereunto he neuer yelded, while his mother, wife, and children came, his harte was fo hardned. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would harken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to destroy and spoyle his countrie, and not as though he ment. to recouer it, or to returne thither againe. Here was in deede the difference between them: C that spialls being layed by the LACED EMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as also for that they were affrayed of him, he was compelled to returne home apaine to ATHENS. Where Martine contrariwife, having bene so honorably received and entertained by the Youses, he could not with honestie for sake them, considering other had done him that honour, as to choose him their generall, and trusted him so farte as they put all their whole armie and power into his handes: and not as thother, whome the LACEDE MO-NIANS rather abused, then yied him, suffering him to goe vp and downe their citie (and afterwardes in the middest of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the ende Alcibiades was compelled to put him selfe into the handes of Tisaphernes : vnlesse they will fay that he went thither of purpose to him, with intent to saue the citie of ATHENS from vt-D ter destruction, for the desire he had to returne home againe. Moreover, we read of Alcibades biades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with money : and when he had it, he & Coriolanua would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Martins in contrarie maner would manner for not so much as accept giftes lawefully offered him by his Captaines, to honour him for his valliantnesse. And the cause why the people did beare him such ill will, for the controuersie they had with the Nobilitie about clearing of dettes, grew: for that they knewe well enough it was not for any gayne or benefit he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and difpleasure he thought to doethem. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the philosopher, doth not without cause commend the singular giftes that were in Al-eibiades, and this inespecially: that he passed all other for winning mens good willes. Wheras E all Martius noble actes and vertues, wanting that affabilitie, became hatefull even to those that received benefit by them, who could not abide his feueritie and felfe will: which caufeth desolation (as Plato sayeth) and men to be ill followed, or altogether for saken. Contrariwife, feeing Alcibiades had a trimme enterteinment, and a very good grace with him, and could facion him selse in all companies: it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and him felfe much honoured and beloued of the people, confidering that some faultes he did, were oftetimes taken for matters of sporte, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurte to the common wealth, yet they did ofte. make him their generali, and trusted him with the charge of the whole citie. Where Martius fuing for an office of honour that was due to him, for the fundrie good feruices he had done F to the state, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus doe we see, that they to whome the one did hurte, had no power to hate him : and thother that honoured his vertue, had no liking to loue his persone. Martimalso did neuer any great exployte, beinge generall of his bribes,

Alcibiader contry men, but when he was generall of their enemies against his naturall contrie: whereas A Alcibiades, being both a private persone, and a generall, did notable service vnto the ATHO their contrie. NIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades wheresoeuer he was present, had the vpper hande ener of his accusers, even as he would him selfe, and their accusations tooke no place against him: onlesse it were in his abscence. Where Martius being present, was condemned by the Ro-MAINES: and in his person murdered, and slaine by the Volsces. But here I can not say they have done well, nor justly, albeit him felfe gave them some colour to doe it, when he openly denied the ROMAINE Ambassadors peace, which after he privatly graunted, at the request of women. So by this dede of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was between both people but leaving warre still between them, he made the Volsces (of whome he was generall) to lose the oportunity of noble victory. Where in deede he should (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawen his armie with their counfaill & confent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their generall: if he had made that accompt of them, as their good will towards him did in duery binde him. Or else, if he did not care for the Volsces in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leave it of when his anger was blowen ouer : yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to pardone his contrie, but rather he should in pardoning his contrie, have spared his mother, bicause his mother & wife were members of the bodie of his contrie and city, which he did be fiege. For in that he vncurteously rejected all publike petitions, requestes of Ambassadors, in. treaties of the bishoppes & priestes, to gratifie only the request of his mother with his departure: that was no acte fo much to honour his mother with as to dishonour his contrie by the which was preserved for the pitie and intercession of a woman, & not for the love of it selfe as if it had not bene worthie of it. And so was this departure a grace, to say truly, very odious and cruell, and deserved no thankes of either partie, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, not at the request of the ROMAINES, against whom he made warre: nor with their consentar whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill happe, the austeritie of his nature, and his hawtie obstinate minde, was the onely cause: the which of itselfe being hatefull to the worlde, when it is joyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churling fierce, and intollerable. For men that have that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, feeming thereby as though they made no estimacion or regard of the people; and yet on the ther fide, if the people should not geue them honour and reuerence, they would straight take h it in scorne, and litle care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides, and Epaminondas, ally fed this manner: not to feeke the good will of the common people by flatterie and diffimulation: which was in deede, bicaufe they despifed that which the people coulde gener take awaye. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced. and fet at any fines, or that they banished them, or gauethem any other repulse: but they loued them as wel as they did before, so soone as they shewed any token of repentaunce, & that they were forie for the wrong they had done them, and were easely made frendes againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that disdaineth to make much of the people, and to have their favour, should much more scorne to seeke to be revenged, when he is repulfed. For to take a repulfe and deniall of honour, so inwardly to the hartscom. meth of no other cause, but that he did too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not diffemble at all, that he was not very glad to fee him felfe honored, and fory to be rejected and denied any honour: but also he sought all the meanes he could to make him selfe beloued of those amongest whome he lived. Whereas Martin stowenes, and havry stomake, did stay him from making much of those, that might aduaunce and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnawe him felfe for spite and anger, when he sawe he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reproued in him; for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperaturce, and cleane handes from taking of bribes and monosable abstiney he may be compared with the most perfect vertuous, and honest men of all GRECE; but not with Alcibiades, who was in that vindoutedly alwayes too licentious & lofely genen, and $ had too small regard of his credit and honestie.

The end of Caius Martius Coriolanus life.

Paulus Æmilius.

HEN I first beganne to write these lives, my intent was to profit other: but fince, continuing and going on, I have muche profited my felf by looking into these histories, as if I looked into a glasse, to frame and facion my life, to the mowld and patterne of these vertuous noblemen. For ronning ouer their manners in this forte, and feeking also to describe their lives: me thinkes I am still conversaunt and familliar with them, and doe as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruse their histories, and to wave the vertues and qualities they have had, and what fingularitie eche of them possessed and to choose and culle out the chiefest things of note in them, and their best spea-B ches and doings most worthie of memorie: Then I crie out, O godds, can there be more passing pleasure in the vvorlde?

Oristhere any thing of more force, to teach man civill maners, & a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the philosopher writeth, that we should praye we might euer see happy images and fightes in the ayer, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, maye rather come to vs, then that is euill and vnfortunate: presupposing a false opinion and doctrine in philosophie, which allureth men to infinite superstitions. That there are good and bad images flying in the ayer, which geue a good or ill impression vnto men', and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of auncient histories, and gathering these lives together which now I seaue before you, and by keeping allwayes in minde the actes of the most noble, vertuous, and best genen men of former age, and worthie memorie: I doe teache and prepare my felfe to shake of & banishe from me, all lewde and dishonest condition, if by chaunce the companie and conversation of them whose companie I keepe, and must of necessitie haunte, doe acquainte me with some vnhappie or vngratious touche. This is easie vnto me, that doe dispose my quiet minde, & not troubled with any passion, vnto the deepe consideration of so many noble examples. As I doe present vnto you now in this volume, the liues of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus AEmilius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good & an vpright minde with them, but were also fortunate and happie, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you shall hardly judge, when you have red ouer their lines, whether wisedome, or good fortune brought them to atchieue to suche honoravse to pleade private mens causes in lawe, neither would creepe into mens favour by fawning vpon any of them: though he fawe it a common practife, & policie of men, to feeke the peo.

Some writers affirme also, that the first of the housether gaue name to all the posteritie after, was Marcus, the sonne of Pythagoras the wife, whom The hange of king Numa for the sweetnes and pleasaunt grace of his tongue, surnamed Marcus Emiliae and those specially affirme it, that saye king Numa was Pythagor as scholler. This Amylius left a daughter behind him called Am. lia, which was maried vnto Stipio the great: and a sonne, Paulus Æmylius, being the same man whose life we presently treate of. His youth fortunately fell out in a florishing time of glorie militing ma-ried to Science and honour, through the fundrie vertues of many great and noble persones living in those dayes, emong whom he made his name famous also: and it was not by that ordinarie arte and course, which the best esteemed young men of that age dyd take and followe. Moreouer, he refused not that common course which other tooke, for that it was contrarie to his nature, or that he could not frame with e-The vertues of Paulus ther of both, if he had bene so disposed: but he rather sought to winne reputation by his ho-AEmylius. nestie, his valliantnes, and vpright dealing, as choosing that the better wave, then either of thother two, in so much as in maruelous shorte time he passed all those that were of his age,

The first office of honour he sued for, was the office of Adilis, in which sute he was presented melius made before twelue other that fued for the felfe fame office: who were men of no small qualitie for AEdilis and they all came afterwardes to be Confuls. After this, he was chosen to be one of the number of the priestes, whom the ROMAINES call Jugures: who have the charge of all the diving tions and foothefayings, in telling of things to come by flying of byrdes, & fignes in the aver. I He was so carefull, and tooke suche paynes to understand how the Romaines dyd vse the fame, & with fuche diligence fought the observation of the auncient religion of ROMAINE

The philoso, reputed of in Rome. Wherein he confirmed the philosophers opinion: that religion is the pher opinion knowledge how to ferue God . For when he dyd any thing belonging to his office of priefthood, he dyd it with great experience, judgment, and diligence, leauing all other thoughtes & without omitting any auncient ceremonie, or adding to any newe, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which feemed light, and of small moment: declaring vine gente in the constraint, them, that though we doe prefume the goddes are easie to be pacified, and that they readilie [ent in rifles. pardone all faultes & scapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for respect of common wealths sake, they should not slightly, nor carelesly dissemble or passe ouer faults committed in those matters. For no man (sayeth he) at the first that committeth any faulte, doth alone trouble the state of the common wealth: but withall, we must thincke he leaveth the groundes of civill government, that is not as carefull to keepe the inflitutions of small matters, as also of the great. So was he also a seuere captaine, and strict observer of all marshall The discipline, not seeking to winne the souldiers loue by flatterie, when he was generall in the field, as many dyd in that time: neither corrupting them for a fecond charge, by shewing him felfe gentle and curteous in the first, vnto those that served vnder him but him selfe dyd orderly shewe them the very rules and preceptes of the discipline of warres, euen as a priest that F should expresse the names and ceremonies of some holy facrifice, wherein were daunger to omitany parte or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the lawe of armes apon rebelA lious and disobedient fouldiers, he kept vp thereby the state of the common weale the better: judging, to ouercome the enemie by force, was but an accessorie as a man mave rerme it, in respect of well training and ordering his cittizens by good discipline. While the ROMAINES were in warres against king Antiochus surnamed the great, in the South partes: all the chiefest captaines of Rome being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West partes towardes SPAYNB, where they were all vp in armes. Thither they fent AEmylius Prætor, not with fixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue: so that vnder the name of Prætor, he had the mylin sem authoritie and dignitie of a Conful. He twife ouercame the barbarous people in mayne Presor into hattell, and flue a thirtie thousand of them, and got this victorie through his great skill Spane. B and wisedome, in choosing the advantage of place and time, to fight with his enemies, AEmylline euen as they passed ouer a river : which easely gave his fouldiers the victorie . Moreo- skilfad to even as they parted out a fitter; which eatery gate his foliated the victorie. Moreos choose place use he tooke there, two hundred and fiftie citties, all which dyd open, and gladly re- and time to ceyue him in. So, leauing all that countrie quiet and in good peace, and having re- fight. ceaued their fealtie by othe made betweene his handes, he returned againe to ROME, not enriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke litle regard to his expences, he spent so franckly, neither was his purse his master, though his reuenue was not great to beare it out: as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had, was litle enough to satisfie his wifes ioynter. His first wife was Pappria, the daughter of a noble Conful Papyrius Maffo, and after they had lived a long time together, he was a divorted from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her . For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The inst cause of the dinorse betweene Scibio the sethem, appeareth not to vs in writing : but me thinckes the tale that is tolde concerning conde, or Fa-

the separation of a certaine mariage is true. That a certen Romaine hauing for sken his bine maximum, weether wife, her friendes fell out with him, and asked him: what fault dost thou finde in her? formes of P. is the not honest of her bodie? is the not fayer? doth the not bring thee goodly children? AEmylius, by But he putting forth his foote, thewed them his shooe, and aunswered them. Is not this find wife. a goodly shooe? is it not finely made? and is it not newe? yet I dare saye there is neuer a A greet sale one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to faye truely, great and open faultes are that for fooke commonly occasions to make husbands put awaye their wives: but yet oftentimes house- his wife. D hold wordes ronne fo betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diversitie of natures, which straungers are not privile vnto) that in processe of time they doe beget suche a straunge alteration of loue and mindes in them, as one house can no lenger holde them. So AEmylius, having put awaye Papyria his first wife, he maried another that brought him two fonnes, which he brought vp with him felfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption, to two of the noblest and richest families of the cittie of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius house, with their wives, and many litle children. Amongest their wives, one of them was the daughter of Paulus AEmylius, after he had bene twife Conful, and had triumphed twife, Maximus, he that was fine times Conful: and the younger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN dyd adopt, being his cosin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the sonne of Cato maried F. the one, and AElius Tubero the other, who was a maruelous honest man, and dyd more Theremees nobly mainteine him felfe in his pouertie, then any other ROMAINE: for they were AEBIM THfixteene persones all of one name, and of the house of the AElians, very neere a urrise and kynne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the cittie, and a small farme quies life. in the countrie, wherewith they enterteined them selues, and liued all together in one not being ashamed of her husbands pouertie, but wondering at his vertue that made him poore. Whereas brethern and kynfemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not farre a fonder, and in other countries, not one neere another, and that rivers parte them not, or Inname aline F walles deuide their landes, leaving great large wastes between them: they are neuer quiet, red information. but still in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this storie laye before the wife, and well aduifed readers, to learne thereby howe to frame their life, and wifely to behave them selves. Now Amylius being chosen Consul, went to make warre with the Li. A GVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, & which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valliat & warlike men, & were very good fouldiers at that time, by reason of their coting warres against the ROMAINE s, whose neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the fur. dest parte of ITALIE, that bordereth upon the great ALPES, & the rowe of ALPES, whereof the foote joyneth to the THVSCAN fea, & pointeth towards AFRICKE, and are mingled with the GAVLES, & SPANYARD S, neighbours vnto that sea coast: who scowring all the Mediterra. mian fea at that time, vnto the straight of Hercules pillers, dyd with their litle light pinnales of pirats, let all the trafficke & entercourse of marchaundise. Amylius being gone to seeke them in their countrie, they taried his comming with an armie of forty thousand men: neuertheles, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were five to one of his, yet he gave B the onfer apon them, and ouerthrew them, and draue them into their citties. Then he fent to offer them peace, for the ROMAINES would not altogether destroye the LIGVRIANS, bicause their countrie was as a rampeyr or bullwarke against the inuasion of the GAVLES, who lave lurking for oportunitie and occasion to inuade ITALIE: whereupon these LIGVRIANS Vel. ded them selves vnto him, and put all their fortes and shippes into his handes. AEmylius delivered vnto them their holdes againe, without other hurte done vnto them, fauing that herafed the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he tooke all their shippes from them, leaving them litle botes of three owers only, and no greater, & fet all the prisoners at libertie they had taken, both by fea and by lande aswell ROMAINES as other, which were a maruelous number. These were all the notable acts he dyd worthie memorie, in the first yere of his Consulshippe, C Afterwards, he oftentimes shewed him felf very desirous to be Consul againe, & dyd put forth him felfe to fue for it: but when he was denied it, he neuer after made fute for it againe, but gaue him felfe only to studie divine things, and to fee his children vertuously brought vp, not only in the ROMAINE tongue which him selfe was taught, but also a litle more curiously in the GREKE tongue. For he dyd not only retaine Grammarians, Rethoricians, and Logitians, but also painters, grauers of images, riders of horses, and huntes of GRECE about his children and he him felfe also (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was ever with themin the schoole when they were at their bookes, and also when they otherwise dvd exercise them felues. For he loued his children as much, or more, then any other Romaine. Now concerning the state of the commo wealth, the ROMAINES were at warres with king Perseus, & they D much blamed the captaines they had sent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and corage, they had fo cowardly behaued them felues, as their enemies laughed them to fcorne: and they receyued more hurte of them, then they dyd vnto the King. For not long before, they had driuen king Antiochus beyound mount Taurus, and had made him forfake the rest of As I A, and had thut him up within the borders of S Y R I A: who was glad that he had bought that contrie with fifteene thousand talets, which he payed for a fine. A little before also, they had ouercome Philip, king of MACEDON, in THESSALY, and had delinered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS, And moreover, having overcome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the worlde was comparable, either for his power or valliantnes) they thought this to great a dishonour to them, that this warre they had against E king Perfew, should hold so long of even hande with them, as if he had bene an enemie equal with the people of Rome: confidering also that they fought not against them, but with the refuse and scattered people of the ouerthrowen armie his father had lost before, and knew not that Philip had left his armie stronger, and more experte by reason of his ouerthrowe, then it was before. As I will briefly reherfe the storie from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greatest power of all the captaines & successours of Alexander the great, having obteined for him felf & his posteritie the title of a King, had a sonne called Demetrius, of who came Antigonus the fecond, that was furnamed Gonatas, whose sonne was also called Demetrius, that raigned no long time, but dyed, and left a young sonne called Philippe. By reason whereof, the Princes and Nobilitie of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme should be left without heire F they preferred one Antigonus, cofin to the last deceased King, and made him marie the mother of Philip the leffe, geuing him the name at the first of the Kings protectour only, and

After him Antigonius reigned Philip, who in his grene youth gaue more hope of him felfe, then any other of the Dofen,king of Kingsbefore: in fo much they thought that one daye he would reftore MACEDON her auncient fame and glorie, and that he alone would plucke downe the pride and power of the Ro-MAINES, who role against all the world. of GAVLE, all alongest the Adriatick sea. The ROMAINES being advertised of these newes, A thought the time served not now to dispose their offices in warres any more by grace & fauour vnto those that sued for them: but contrariwise, that they should call some noble man that were very skilfull, and a wife captaine, and could differely gouerne and performe things of great charge. As Paulus AEmylius, a man well stepped on in yeres, being three score yere olde: and yet of good power by reason of the lufty young men his sonnes, & sonnes in lawe. besides a great number of his friends and kinsefolke. So all that bare great authoritie, dyd altogether with one consent counfaill him to obey the people, which called him to the Confull hippe. At the beginning, in deede he delayed the people muche that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them: faying, he was no meete man neither to defire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the ende, feeing the people dyd vrge it apon him, by knoc. R king continually at his gates, and calling him alowde in the streetes, willing him to come into the market place, and perceyuing they were angrie with him, bicause he refused it: he was content to be perfuaded. And when he stoode among them that sued for the Consulshippe the people thought straight that he stoode not there so muche for desire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of affured victorie, and happie successe of this begonne warre: so great was their loue towardes him, and the good hope they had of him, that they chose him Conful agains the second time. Wherefore so some as he was chosen, they would not proceede to drawing of lottes according to their custome, which of the two Confuls should happen to goe into MACEDON: but presently with a full and whole consent of them all. they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Conful now, and C appointed to make warre apon king Perfeus, all the people dyd honorably companie him home vnto his house: where a little girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant. came weeping vnto her father. He making muche of her : asked her why the wept. The poore girle aunswered, colling him about the necke, and kiffing him: Alas, father, wote you proninced by what? our Perseus is dead. She ment it by a little whelpe so called, which was her playe sellowe. In good hower, my girle, fayed he, I like the figne well. Thus doth Cicero the orator reporte it in his booke of divinations. The ROMAINES had a custome at that time, that suche as were elected Confuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) should make an oration of thanckes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the custome) being gathered together to heave AEmylius speake, he made this D oration vnto them. That the first time he sued to be Consul, was in respect of him selfe, stanthe Romaines ding at that time in neede of fuche honour: now he offred him felfe the fecond time vnto it. when he was for the good love he bare vnto them, who stoode in nede of a generall, wherefore he thought him felfe nothing bounde nor beholding vnto them now. And if they dyd thincke also this warre might be better followed by any other, then by him felfe, he would prefently with all his harte refigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any trust or confidence in him, that they thought him a man sufficient to discharge it: then that they would not speake nor medle in any matter that concerned his duetie, and the office of a generall, fauing only, that they would be diligent (without any wordes) to doe whatfoeuer he commaunded, and should be necessarie for the warre and service they tooke in hande. For if every man would be a F. commaunder, as they had bene heretofore, of those by whom they should be commaunded: then the world would more laughe them to fcome in this feruice, then euer before had bene accustomed. These wordes made the Romain as very obedient to him, and conceyued good hope to come, being all of the very glad that they had refused those ambitious flatterers that fued for the charge, & had geue it vnto a man, that durft boldly & franckly tell them the troth. Marke how the ROMAINES by yelding vnto reason & vertue, came to comand all other, & to make them selves the mightiest people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius setting forward to this warre, had winde at will, and fayer paffage to bring him at his iorneis ende: I impute it to good fortune, that fo quickly and fafely conveyed him to his campe. But for the rest of his exployees he dyd in all this warre, when parte of them were performed by his F owne hardines, other by his wifedome and good counfell, other by the diligence of his friendes in feruing him with good will, other by his owne resolute constancy and corage in extremest daunger, and last, by his maruelous skill in determining at an instant what was to bedone: I cannot attribute any notable acte or worthy service vnto this his good fortune, they talke of fo much, as they maye doe in other captaines doings. Onles they will faye peraduenture, that Perseus couetousnes and miserie was Amilius good fortune : for his miserable Perseuscofeare of spending money, was the only cause and destruction of the whole realme of M A. Metoussies and teare or ipending money, was the only cause and destitution of the whole realise of the was in good state and hope of continuing in prosperitie. For there came the definedowne into the countrie of MACEDON at king Perfeus request, tenne thousand Bastarnæ a Hien of him horse backe, and as many footemen to them, who allwayes joyned with them in battell, all felfe, and his mercenary fouldiers, depending upon paye and enterteinment of warres, as men that could Maced m. not plowe nor fowe, nor trafficke marchandise by sea, nor skill of grafing to gaine their living Bastane. a B with: & to be shorte, that had no other occupation or marchadise, but to serue in the warres, people, and to ouercome those with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incampe & lodge in the MEDICA, neere to the MACEDONIANS, who fawe them to goodly great men, and so well trained & exercised in handling all kinde of weapons, so braue and lustic in wordes and threates against their enemies: they beganne to plucke vp their hartes, & to looke bigge, imagining that the ROMAINES would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to looke them in the face, and only to fee their marche, it was fo terrible and fearefull. But Perfeus, after he had incoraged his men in this forte, and had put them in suche a hope and iollitie, when this barbarous supply came to aske him a thousand crownes in hande for enery captaine, he was fo damped & troubled withall in his minde, casting vp the summe it came to, that his only coe uetousnes and miserie made him returne them backe, and resuse their service: not as one that ment to fight with the ROMAINES, but rather to spare his treasure, and to be a husband for Nove, what them, as if he should have geven up a straight accompt vnto them of his charges in this became of warre, against whom he made it. And not with standing also his enemies dyd teache him what bandry. he had to doe, confidering that befides all other their warlike furniture & munition, they had no leffe then a hundred thousand fighting menlying in campe together, ready to execute the Consuls commaundement. Yet he taking vpon him to resist so pussant an armie, and to mainteine the warres, which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in enterteining fuch multitudes of men, and more then needed: hardly would depart with his gold and filuer, but kept thousand me. it safe locked up in his treasurie, as if he had bene affrayed to touche it, and had bene none of D his. And he dydnot shewe that he came of the noble race of these kings of LYDIA, and of Phoenicia, who gloried to be riche: but shewed howe by inheritaunce of bloude he chalenged some parte of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both bicause they esteemed to buye victorie with money, not money with victorie, dyd many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common faying in olde time, that it was not Philip.but his gold and filuer that wanne the citties of GR RCB. And Alexander when he went to conquer the Indes, seeing the Macedonians carie with them all the wealth of Persia, which made his campe very heavie, and flowe to marche: he him selfe first of all set fire of his owne cariage that conveyed all his necessaries, and persuaded other to doe the like, that they might marche more lightly, and easelier goe on the iorney. But Perseus contrarilie would not spend F any parte of his goodes, to faue him felfe, his children and Realme, but rather yelded to be led prisoner in triumphe with a great ransome, to shewe the Romaines howe good a husband he had bene for them. For he dyd not only fend away the GAVLES without geuing them paye as he had promised, but moreouer having persuaded Gentius king of Luly king to take his Gentius king parte in these warres, for the summe of three hudred talents which he had promised to furnish and dealers. him with : he caused the money to be told, and put vp in bagges by those whom Gentius lent fem. toreceive it. Whereupon Gentius thinking him felfe fure of the money promifed, committed a fond and fowle parte: for he stayed the ambassadours the Romaines sent vaco him, and committed them to prisone. This parte being come to Perseus eares, he thought now he need ded not hier him with money to be an enemie to the Rom kings conidering he had waded to F fatre, as that he had already done, was as a manifest signe of his ill will towards them, and that it was to late to looke backe and repenthim, now that his fowle parte had plonged him into certen warres, for an vincerten hope. So dyd he abuse the vinsortunate Kings, and defrauded king Genime.

him of the three hundred talents he had promifed him. And worfe then this, thortely after A he suffered Lucius Anicius the ROMAINE Prætor, whom they fent against him with an armie to plucke king Gentius, his wife, and children, out of his Realme and Kingdome, and to carie them prisoners with him. Now when Amylius was arrived in MACEDON, to make warrea. gainst such an enemie: he made no manner of reckoning of his persone, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one campe he had foure thousand horsemen, and no leffe at the foot of then forty thousand footemen, with the which armie he had planted him selfe alongest the fea side, by the foote of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpossible to be approched: and there he had so well fortified all the straites and passages vnto him with fortifications of woode, that mis 40000 he thought him selfe to lye safe out of all daunger, and imagined to dalie with Amylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. AEmylius in the meane featon laye not idle, B but occupied his wittes throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put fome thing in proofe. And perceyuing that his fouldiers by ouermuche licentious libertie (wherein by fufferaunce they lived before) were angrie with delaying and lying still, and that they dyd bufilie occupie them selues in the generalles office, saying this, and suche a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundely, and commaunded them they should medle no more to curiously in matters that perteined not to them, and that they should take care for nothing els, but to fee their armour & weapon ready to ferue valliantly, & to vse their fwordes after the ROMAINES facion, when their generall should appoint and commaund them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to them felues, he commaunded those that watched should have no speares nor pykes, bicause they should be more wakefull, C having no long weapon to refift the enemie, if they were affaulted. The greatest trouble his army had, was lacke of freshe water, bicause the water that ranne to the sea was very litle, and maruelous fowle by the sea side. But AEmylius considering they were at the soote of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruelous height, and full of wodde withall) coniectured, feeing the trees to frethe and grene, that there should be some little pretie springes among The original them, which ranne vnder the grounde. So he made them digge many holes and welles alongest the mountaine, which were straight filled with fayer water, being pent within ground before for lacke of breaking open the heades, which then ranne downe in streames, and met together in fundrie places. And yet some doe denie, that there is any meeting of waters within the grounde, from whence the springes doe come. For they saye, that ronning out of the D earth as they doe, it is not for that, that the water breaketh out by any violence, or openethin any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendreth and rifeth at the fame time and place where it ronneth out, turning the fubstaunce into water, which is a moist vapour, thickneth and waxeth cold by the coldnes of the earth, and so becommeth a streame, and ronneth downe. Euen so, saye they, as womens brestes are not allwayes full of milke, as milke pannes are that continually keepe milke, but doe of them felues convert the nutriment women take into milke, and after commeth forth at their nipples: the very like are springes and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, which have no meeting of hidden waters, nor hollowe places capable, readily to deliuer water from them, as one would drawe it out of a pompe, or festerne, from so many great brookes, and deepe E rivers. But by their natural coldnes and moisture, they waxe thicke, and put forth the vapour & aver fo ftrong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reason why the places where they digge and open the earth, doe put forth more abundaunce of water by opening the grounde: like as womens breftes doe geue more milke, when they are most drawen and flickt, bicause in a sorte they doe better seede the vapour within them, and convert it thereby into a ronning humour. Where, to the contrarie, those partes of the earth that are not digged, nor have no vent outward, are the more vnable, and leffe mete to ingender water, having not that prouocation and course to ronne, that causeth the bringing forth of moisture. Yet fuch as mainteine this opinion, doe geue them occasion that love argument, to contrarie them thus. Then we may fave by like reason also, that in the bodies of beastes there is no bloud F long before, and that it ingendreth upon a fodaine, when they are hurte, by transferring of fome spirite or fleshe that readilie chaungeth into some ronning licoure. And moreover, they

A are confuted by the comon experience of these mine men, that digge in the mines for mettell or that vndermine castells to winne them: who when they digge any great depth, doe many rimes meete in the bowells of the earth with ronning rivers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle and litle, as of necessitie it should be, if it were true, that you the present opening of the ground, the humour should immediatly be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we see oftentimes that in cutting through a mountaine or rocke, sodainely there ronneth out a great quantitie of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to returne to our historie againe. Amylius laye there a convenient time, & stirred not: and it is faved there were neuer seene two so great armies one so neere to the other, and to be so quier. In the ende, cafling many things with him felfe, and deuising fundrie practiles, he was enformed of another wave to enter into MACEDON, through the countrie of PERREBIA, ouer against the temple called Pythion, & the rocke vpon which it is built, where there laye no garrison: which gaue him better hope to passe that waye, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrownes & hardnes of the waye vnto it. So, he brake the matter to his confaill. Thereupon Scipio called Nafical the fonne adopted of that great Scipio the African, who became afterwards a great ma, scipio Nafica, & was prefidet of the Senate or counsell) was the first man that offred him self to leade them, and Fabina whom it would pleafe him to fend to take that passage, & to assault their enemies behind. The offer them fecond was Fabius Maximus, the eldest sonne of AEmylius, who being but a very young man, feluer to take role notwithstanding, & offred him self very willingly. Emplies was very glad of their offers, & the straighte. gaue them not so many men as Polybius writeth, but so many as Nasica him self declareth, in a Cletter of his he wrote to a King, where he reporteth all the storie of this iorney . There were 3000. ITALIANS leavied in ITALIE, by the cofederats of the ROMAINES, who were not of the ROMAINE legions, & in the left winge about 5000. Besides those, Nasica tooke also 120. men at armes, & about 200. CRETANS & THRACIANS mingled together, of those Harpalus had fent thither. With this number Nasica departed from the campe, & tooke his waye toward the sea fide, & lodged by the teple of Hercules, as if he had determined to doe this feate by lea, to enuironne the cape of the enemies behind. But when the fouldiers had supped, & that it was darke night, he made the captaines of euery bande privie to his enterprise, & so marched all night a contrary wave from the fea, vntill at the length they came under the teple of Pythion, where he lodged to rest the souldiers that were fore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus D is aboue tenne furlonge highe, as appeareth in a place ingrauen by him that measured it.

King Perseus perceyning in the meane time that Amylius stirred not from the place where he lave, mistrusted nothing his practife, and the comming of Nasics who was at hande vntill such time as a traitour of CRETA (flealing from Nasta) dydreneate vnto him the pretended practife, as also the ROMNINES compating of him about ille work diedmuche at these newes; how beithe removed nothis campe from the place he lave in hur dispatchedone of his captaines called Milon, with tenne thousand straungers; and myo thous F fand MACEDONYANE and ftraightly commanded him with all the possible speeds he could to get the toppe of the hill before them Polybius fayeth, that the Roman scame and gaus them an alaromy when they were ildeping But Nasion writeth; that there was a maruelous

Natica ranne fully ronning awaye in his coate without armour or weapon, he followed him without any daninger, and so went downe to the valley, with the fafety of all his companie. This confide fortuning thus, Present raised his campe in great haste from the place where he was, and being disapointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wittes ende, and not knowing howe to determine. Yet was he conftrained either to ftaye, and incampe before the circient PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battell: or els to deuide his armie into his citties & strong holdes, and to receyue the warres within his owne countrie, the which being once crepting could neuer be driven out againe, without great murder & bloudeshed. Hereupon his friends a dyd counfell him, to choose rather the fortune of battell; alledging vnto him, that he was the

So he pitched his campe, and viewed the situation of the places all about, and deniested his cape ded the companies amongest his captaines, purposing to genea whotte charge vpon the enemies when they thould drawe nere. Wherfore, after he had vowed a solemne sacrifice of a hundred oxen to Hercules, and also games of prices at the weapons, he commaunded his captaines to put their men in readines to fight: & to fought to winne time, tarying till the funne came about in the after noone towardes the

C flirring of both campes, what the furie of the battell would come to: came out of his tent, and paffing by the bandes, dyd encorage them, and prayed them to sticke to it like men. In the meane time, Nasica thrusting him selfe into the place where the skirmishe was whottest.perceyued the army of the enemies marching in battell, ready to joyne. The first that marched in the voward, were the THRACIANS, who seemed terrible to looke apon, as he writeth him self: for they were mightie made men, and caried maruelous bright targets of steele before them, The army of their legges were armed with greaues, and their thighes with tases, their coates were blacke. the Macedo-&marched shaking heavy halberds vpon their shoulders. Next vnto these THRACIANS, there mians, marfollowed them all the other straungers and fouldiers whom the King had hiered, diverfely armed and set forth : for they were people of fundrie nations gathered together, emong whom in banel. D the PEONIANS were mingled. The third squadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them chosen men, aswell for the flower of their youthe, as for the valliantnes of their persones: and they were all in goodly gilt armours, and braue purple cassocks apon them, spicke, and spanne newe. And at their backes came after them, the olde bandes to shewe them selues out of the campe, with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to shine with the brightnes of their steele and copper. And all the hilles and mountaines thereabouts dyd ringe againe like an Eccho, with the crie and noyle of fo many fighting men, one incoraging another. In this order they marched fo fiercely, with fo great harte burning, & fuch fwiftnes: that the first which The banell were flaine at the incounter, fell dead two furlonges from the campe of the Romaines. The between Percharge being geuen, and the battell begonne, AEmylius galloping to the voward of his bat-E tell, perceyued that the captaines of the MACEDONIANS which were in the first ranckes, had already thrust their pikes into the ROMAINES targets, so as they could not come neere them with their swordes; and that the other MACEDONIANS carving their targets behinde them, had now plucked them before them, and dyd base their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the targets of the ROMAINES. Which when he had considered, and of what strength and force his walle and rancke of targets was, one joyning so neere another. and what a terrour it was to see a fronte of a battell with so many armed pikes and steele heades: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any fight he euer fawe before. Neuertheles he could wifely diffemble it at that time. And so passing by the companies of his horsemen, without either curaces or helmet voon his head, he shewed a noble cherefull coun-fainte facrifice of cowards neither doth receyue their prayers, bicause they be vnreasonable. For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not, should byt the white : nor that he should winne Victorie none the victorie, that bideth not the battell: neither that he should have any good, that doeth no. by labour, nest thing toward it: nor that a naughty man should be fortunate, and prosper. The goddes dud fauour AEmylins prayers, bicause he prayed for victorie with his sworde in his hande, and fighting dyd call to them for ayde. Howbeit there is one Polidonius a writer, who fayeth he was in that time, and moreouer, that he was at the battell : and he hath written an historic conteining many bookes of the actes of king Perfeus, where he fayeth that it was not for fainte harte, nor vnder culler to facrifice vnto Hercules, that Perfeus went from the battellibut bicaufe he had a stripe of a horse on the thighe the daye before. Who though he could not very well helpe him felf, and that all his friends fought to perfuade him not to goe to the battell: yet he caused one of his horse to be brought to him not with standing (which he commonly ysed to ryde vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of dartes were throwen at him from both fides. And emong those, he had a blowe with a darte that hurte him fomwhat, but it was ouerthwart, and not with the pointe, and dyd hit him on the left fide glawnfing wife, with fuche a force, that it rent his coate, and rafed his skinne vnderneath so as it left a marke behinde a long time after. And this is all that Polidomiss writeth to defend and excuse Persess. The Romaines having their hands full, and being staved by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breache into them: there was a captaine of the PELIGNIAN'S called Salim, who tooke the enfigne of his band, and cast it among the prease of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians brake in apon them, with C a maruelous force & furie into that place : for all ITALIANS thinke it to great a shame & difhonour for fouldiers, to lofe, or forfake their enfigne. Thus was there maruelous force of both fides vsed in that place: for the Pelignians proved to cut the Maced onlans pikes with their fwordes, or els to make them geue backe with their great targets, or to make a breache into them, and to take the pikes with their handes. But the MACED ONIANS to the contrarie. holding their pikes fast with both hands, ranne them thorow that came neere vnto them: so that neither target nor corfelet could hold out the force and violence of the pushe of their pikes, in so much as they turned up the heeles of the Pelignians and Terracinians, who like desperate beastes without reason, shutting in them selues emong their enemies. ranne wilfully vpon their owne deathes, and their first rancke were flaine every man of them. Thereupon those that were behind, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backes, and only retired geuing backe, towardes the mountaine Olorus, Emylius feeing that (as Polidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, bicause that some of his men gaue backe: other durst not fronte the battell of the Maced onlans, which was fo strongly imbattelled of euery fide, and fo mured in with a wall of pikes, presenting their armed heads on euerie fide a man could come, that it was impossible to breake into them, no not fo muche as to come neere them only. Yet notwithstanding, bicause the field was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the fronte, could not allwayes keepe that walle, continuing their targets close one to another, but they were driven of necessities breake and open in many places as it happeneth oft in great battells, according to the great E force of the fouldiers: that in one place they thrust forward, and in another they gene backe, and leave a hole. Wherefore Amylius fodainly taken the vauntage of this occasion, deuided his men into small companies, and commaunded them they should quickly thrust in between their enemies, and occupie the places they fawe voyde in the fronte of their enemies, and that they should set on them in that forte, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with divers companies, in fundry places. Amylius gave this charge vnto the private captaines of every band and their lieutenaunts, and the captaines also gave the like charge vnto their fouldiers that could skilfully execute their commaundement. For they went prefently into those partes where they sawe the places open, and being once entred in among them, some gaue charge vpon the flanckes of the MACED ONIANS, where they were all naked and vnarmed: other fet vpon them behind: fo that the strength of all the corpes of the battell (which confifteth in keeping close together) being opened in this forte, was ftraight ouerthrowen. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a fewe against a fewe: the MACEDON I ANS with their litle shorte swordes, came to strike vpon the great sheldes of the Romaines, which were very strong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrarie, were driven of necessitie to receaue the blowes of the strong heavy swordes of the ROMAINES, vpon their litle weake targettes: so that what with their heavines, and the vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted voon them, there was no target nor corselet, but they passed it through, and ranne them in . By reason whereof they could make no long refiftance, whereupon they turned their backes, and ranne awaye. But when they came to the squadron of the olde beaten souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruellest fight and most desperate service, where they saye that Marcus Cato (sonne of The vallianwas the cruencing it and more despetate lettice, where they saye that of said the control of Marpropert Cato, and sonne in lawe of Aemylius) (the wing all the valliantnes in his persone that a cut cato. noble minde could possibly performe, lost his sword which fell out of his hande. But he like a young man of noble corage, that had bene valliantly brought vp in all discipline, & knew how to follow the steppes of his father (the noblest persone that ever man sawe) was to shewe then his value and worthines: and thought it more honour for him there to dye, then liuing to fuffer his enemies to enious any spoyle of his. So, by & by he ranne into the ROMAINE army, to finde out some of his friendes, whom he tolde what had befalled him, and prayed them to helpe him to recouer his fworde: whereto they agreed. And being a good company of lufty valliant fouldiers together, they rushed straight in among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and so dyd set apon them with suche sorce and surie, that they made a lane C through the middest of them, and with greatslaughter and spilling of bloude, euen by plaine force, they cleared the waye still before them. Now when the place was voyded, they fought for the sworde, and in the ende founde it with great a doe, amongest a heape of other swords and dead bodies, whereat they reioyced maruelously. Then singing a songe of victorie, they went againe more fiercely then before to geue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not vet broken a fonder : vntill suche time as at the length, the three thousand chosen MACED o-NIAN'S fighting valliantly euen to the last man, and neuer for saking their rancks, were all slaine inthe place. After whose ouerthrowe, there was a great slaughter of other also that fled: so that all the valley and foote of the mountaines thereaboutes was couered with dead bodies. Horie of Per-The next daye after the battell, when the Romaines dyd passe ouer the river of Leucus, they sem. founde it ronning all a bloude. For it is fayed there were flaine at this field, of Perfeus men, aboue fiue and twentie thousand: and of the ROMAINES fide, as Posidonius sayeth, not aboue fixe score, or as Nasica writeth, but foure score only. And for so great an ouerthrowe, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done, and executed. For they beganne to fight about three of the clocke in the after noone, and had wonne the victorie before foure, and all the rest of The banell the daye they followed their enemies in chase, an hundred & twenty furlonges from the place funghs and where the battell was fought: fo that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So fuche as returned, were received with maruelous great ioye of their pages that went out with linckes and torches lighted, to bring their masters into their tentes, where their men had made great bonfiers, and decked them vp with crownes and F garlands of laurell, fauing the generalles tent only; who was very heavy, for that of his two somes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be founde, which he loued best of the twaine, bicause he sawe he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethern. For The validation euen then, being newe crept out of the shell as it were, he was maruelous valliant and hardie, new f Scipio and defired honour wonderfully. Now Æmylius thought he had bene cast awaye, fearing least for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the rathnes of his youthe, he had put him felfe to farre in fight amongest the prease of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard straight what forowe AEmylius was in, and how gricuously he tooke it. The Romaines being fet at supper, rose from their meate, and with torche light some ranne to Amylius tent, other went out of the campe to feeke him among the dead bodies, if they might knowe him: fo all the

F campe was full of forowe and mourning, the vallies & hilles all abouts dyd ringe againe with the cries of those that called Scipio alowde. For even from his childhood he had a natural gift in him, of all the rare and fingular partes required in a captaine & wife gouernour of the hope of his comming againe, he happely returned from the chafe of the enemies, with two or three of his familliars only, all bloudied with new bloude(like a fwift running greyhownde fleshed with the bloude of the hare) having pursued very farre for iove of the victorie. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the citties of CARTHAGE and NUMANTIVE who was the greatest man of warre, and valliantest captaine of the ROMAINES in his time. and of the greatest authoritie and reputation emong them. Thus fortune deferring till and ther time the execution of her spite, which she dyd beare to so noble an exployte, suffered Amilius for that time to take his ful pleasure of that noble victorie. And as for Perseus, he fled first from the cittie of Pydne, vnto the cittie of Pella, with his horsemen, which were in manner all faued. Whereupon the footemen that faued them felues by flying meeting them by the wave, called them traitours, cowards, and villanes: & worfe then that, they turned them of their horle backes, and fought it out lustely with them. Perfew feeing that, and fearing leaf this mutinie might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horse out of the highe wave. and pulled of his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing leaft they should knowe him by these tokens: and bicause he might more easely speake with his friends by the wave, he lighted a foote, and led his horse in his hande. But suche as were about him. one made as though he would mende the latchet of his shooe, an other seemed to water his horse, another as though he would drincke: so that one dragging after another in this some they all left him at the last, and ranne their waye, not fearing the enemies furie so muche, as their Kings crueltie: who being greued with his misfortune, fought to laye the faulte of the ? Time, to due ouerthrowe vpon all other, but him felfe. Now he being come into the cittle of Pella by night, Eucline and Eudens, two of his treasorers came vnto him, and speaking boldly (but our Serued to the of time) prefumed to tell him the great faulte he had committed, and dyd counsell him also what he should doe. The King was so moued with their presumption, that with his owner handes he stabbed his dagger in them both, and slue them outright. But after this facte, all his feruauntes and friendes refused him, and there only taried with him but Euander Can-about him, that he had vnwares gener to the fouldiers of CRETA, his plate and vessell of gold to be spoyled, being those which in olde time belonged vnto Alexander the great: & prayed them with teares in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to chaunge it for ready money. Now suche as knewe his nature, founde streight this was but a fraude and a CRETAN lye, to deceaue the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and dyd restoreagaine the plate they had, dyd loofe it euery iotte, for he neuer payed them pennie of it. So he r got of his friendes, the value of thirtie talents which his enemies sone after dyd take from him. And with that fumme he went into the Ile of Samothracia, where he tooke the fanchuarie and priviledge, of the temple of Castor and Pollux. They fave, that the MACEDO NIANS of long continuaunce dyd naturally loue their Kings: but then feeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hartes failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and fubmitted them selues vnto Amyline, and made him lorde of the whole Realme of Maca-DON in two dayes: and this doth feeme to confirme their wordes, who impute all AEmilia doings vnto his good fortune. And furely, the maruelous fortune he happened on in the cittle of Amphipolis, doth confirme it muche, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the godds. For one daye beginning to doe sacrifice, lightning fell from hear uen, and fet all the wodde a fire apon the aulter, & fanctified the facrifice, But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. into the cittle of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the cittle of ALEPSE, and that the feare

with him, and that was, auarice and miferie. For he made his complainte vnto those that were the cittle of Pellawas taken, as the people of Rome were at the liftes or showe place, seing horses ronne for games : sodainly there rose a rumour at the entring into the listes where the News games were, how Amylius had wonne a great battell of king Perfeus, and had conquered all bringle to MACADON. This newes was rife straight in enery mans mouthe, and there followed vpon it a Macedin in maruelousioye and great cheere in euery corner, with showtes and clapping of handes, that continued all the daye through the cittle of ROMB. Afterwards they made diligent enquierie, Atmyllia of how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine authour could be knowen, and euery man and no man faved they heard it spoken: so as in the ende it came to nothing, and passed awaye in that force knews some for a time, But shortely after, there came letters, and certen newes that made them wonder they come. more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it i which B could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We doe reade also of abattell that was fought in ITALIE, nere vnto the river of SAGRA, wheref newes was brought the very fame daye vnto PELOPONNES VS. And of another also in like manner that was fought in Asia against the Madas, before the cittle of Mycalathe news whereof came the same daye vnto the campe of the GRE CHANS; lying before the cittle of PLAT OEBS. And in that great iorney where the ROMAINES ouerthrewe the Tarquines, and the armie of the LATINES: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they fawe two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victorie to Rome, and they judged they were Castor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some stolde them: that he wondred howe they could fo quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softely by the beard with both their handes, and even in the market place his heare being blacke before, was presently turned yellowe. This miracle made them beleeue the reporte the man made, who euer after was called AEnobarbus, as you would faye, bearded as yellowe as golde. Ano- AEnobarbus ther like matter that happened in our time, maketh all suche newes credible. For when An- why so called. tonius rebelled against the emperour Domitian, the cittle of Rome was in a maruelous perplexitie, bicause they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grewe asodaine rumour of victorie, and it went currantly through Rome, that Amonius him selse was flaine, and all his armie ouerthrowen, & not a man left a liue. This rumour was so rise, that many of the chiefest men of Rome beleeved it, and dyd facrifice thereupon vnto the goddes. D geging them thankes for the victorie. But when the matter came to fifting, who was the first authour of the rumour: no man could tell. For one put it ouer still to another, and dyed so in the ende amongest the people, as in a bottomles matter, for they could neuer boult out any Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his iorney to make this warre, met with postes that brought him letters for the certen victorie; and remembring the rumour of the victorie that ranne before in Rome, he founde it true, that it was on the very fame daye the victorie was gotten, and the distaunce betweene Rome & the place where the field was wonne, was aboue twenty thousand furloges of. Euery man in our time knoweth this tobe true. But againe to our historie. Cn. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prife with him for a fumme of money to conuey him awaye by night: but the CRETAN served him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken a borde by night into his vessell, all the Kings treasure of golde and silver, he sent him worde that he should not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and feruauntes, where in deede was no possibilitie to take (hipping: but The missrathe next night following he hoyfed faile, and got him awaye. Whereupon the footemen that faued them felues by flying, meeting them, by the wave, called them traitours, cowards, and villanes: & worfe then that, they turned them of their horse backes, and fought it out lustely with them. Perseus seeing that, and searing least this mutinie might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horse out of the highe waye, and pulled of his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing leaft the should knowe him by these tokens: and bicause he might more easely speake with his frience they all left him at the last, and ranne their waye, not fearing the enemies furie so muche, as their Kings crueltie: who being greued with his misfortune, fought to laye the faulte of the

what he should doe. The King was so moued with their presumption, that with his owner his feruauntes and friendes refused him, and there only taried with him but Euander Car-

TAN, Archedamus ATOLIAN, and New BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane fouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it was not for the good will they dy beare him, but for the loue of his golde and filuer, as bees that keepe their hiues for loue of and veffell of golde and filuer, to the value of fiftie talents. But first of all, when he was come into the cittle of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the cittle of ALEPSE, and that the feare

was well blowen ouer: he returned againe to his olde humour, which was borne and bred gaine the plate they had, dyd loofe it every iotte, for he never payed them pennie of it. So he r got of his friendes, the value of thirtie talents which his enemies sone after dyd take from him. And with that fumme he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the fan-with him, and that was, an arice and miferie. For he made his complainte vnto those that were about him, that he had vnwares genen to the fouldiers of CRETA, his plate and veffell of gold to be spoyled, being those which in olde time belonged vnto Alexander the great: & prayed gooddes. them with teares in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to chaunge it for ready money. Now fuche as knewe his nature, founde streight this was but a fraude and a CRETAN lye, to deceaue the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and dyd restores.

NIANS of long continuaunce dyd naturally loue their Kings: but then feeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hartes failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and fubmitted them selues vnto Amylius, and made him lorde of the whole Realme of Macs-DON in two dayes: and this doth feeme to confirme their wordes, who impute all Emilia doings vnto his good fortune. And furely, the maruelous fortune he happened on in the citie of Amphipolis, doth confirme it muche, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the godds. For one daye beginning to doe facrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and set all the wodde a fire apon the aulter, & sanctified the sacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure dayes after Perfess had loft the battell, & that abattell that was fought in ITALIE, nere vnto the river of SAGRA, wherof newes was brought the very fame daye vnto PELOPONNES VS. And of another also in like manner that was fought in Asia against the Madas, before the cittle of Mycala; the newes whereof came the same dave vnto the campe of the .GR & CFANS, lying before the cittle of PLAT OFFS. And in that great iorney where the ROMAINES ouerthrewe the Tarquines, and the armie of the LATINES: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they fawe two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victorie to Rome, and they judged they were Castor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some stolde them: that he wondred howe they C could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softely by the beard with both their handes, and even in the market place his heare being blacke before, was presently turned yellowe. This miracle made them beleeue the reporte the man made. who euer after was called AEnobarbus, as you would faye, bearded as yellowe as golde. Ano- AEnobarbus ther like matter that happened in our time, maketh all fuche newes credible. For when An why so called. tonius rebelled against the emperour Domitian, the cittle of Rome was in a maruelous perplexitie, bicause they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grewe asodaine rumour of victorie, and it went currantly through Rome, that Antonius him selfe was flaine, and all his armie ouerthrowen, & not a man left a liue. This rumour was fo rife, that many of the chiefest men of Rome beleeved it, and dyd sacrifice thereupon vnto the goddes, D gening them thankes for the victorie. But when the matter came to fifting, who was the first authour of the rumour: no man could tell. For one put it ouer still to another, and dyed so in the ende amongest the people, as in a bottomles matter, for they could never boult out any certen grounde of it: but euen as it came flying into Rome, so went it flying awaye againe, no man can tell howe. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his iorney to make this warre, met with postes that brought him letters for the certen victorie: and remembring the rumour of the victorie that ranne before in Rome, he founde it true, that it was on the very fame daye the victorie was gotten, and the distaunce betweene Rome & the place where the field was wonne, was aboue twenty thousand furloges of. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe to our historie. Cn. Octanius, lieutenant of the armie of AEmylius by fea, cn. octanius, E came to ancker vnder the Ile of Samo Thracia, where he would not take Perfeus by force Aemylius out of the fanctuarie where he was , for the reuerence he dyd beare vnto the goddes Castor by fea. and Pollux: but he dyd besiege him in suche sorte, as he could not scape him, nor slye by sea out of the Ilande. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRBTAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prife with him for a fumme of money to conuey him awaye by night: but the CRETAN serued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken a borde by night into his veffell, all the Kings treasure of golde and silver, he sent him worde that he should not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with horses ronne for games : sodainly there rose a rumour at the entring into the listes where the News games were, how Amylius had wonne a great battell of king Perfeus, and had conquered all bringh to Macadon. This newes was rife straight in enery mans mouthe, and there followed vpon it a Rome cut of Macadon in maruelousioye and great cheere in enery corner, with showtes and clapping of handes, that continued all the daye through the cittle of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquierie, Aunylius of how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine authour could be knowen, and every man and no man faved they heard it spoken: so as in the ende it came to nothing, and passed awaye in that sorte knowe house for a time. But shortely after, there came letters, and certen newes that made them wonder they came.

his wife, his children and feruauntes, where in deede was no possibilitie to take (hipping : but The miferathe next night following he hoyled faile, and got him awaye. It was a pittiefull thing that Per- fem was F few was driven to doe and fuffer at that time . For he came downe in the night by ropes yout brought vinto, of a litle straight windowe vpon the walles, and not only him self, but his wife and litle babes, by the craft who never knewe before what flying and hardnes ment. And yet he fetched a more grienous of acres and 278 bitter fighe, when one tolde him on the peere, that he fawe Oroandes the CRETAN vnderfalle in the mayne seas. Then daye beginning to breake, and seeing him selfe voyde of all hope, he ranne with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the fanctuarie again, before the ROMATHES that fawe him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had geuen them him felfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruelously loued, and who then dyd traiterously betrave him: for he deliuered his children vnto the Romaines. Which parte was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will followe her little ones being taken from her) to yeld him felfe into their hands that had his children. Now he had a special confidence in Scipio Nalica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeld him felfe; but it was ann.

And in the ende, confidering howe necessitie enforced him, he yelded him felfe into the hands of Cneus Octauius, wherein he shewed plainely, that he had another vicein him more vinmanly and vile, then auarice: that was, a fainte harte, and feare to dye. But hereby felf in Samo he depriued him felf of others pittie & compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot denie and take from the afflicted, and specially from them that have a noble harte. For he made request they would bring him vnto the general! Æmyline, who rose from his chayer when he fawe him come, and went to mete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to mete a great King, by fortune of warre, and by the will of the goddes, fallen into that most lamentable facte. But he to the contrarie, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued him selfe. For he fell downe at his seete, and embraced his knees, and vttered such evincomely speache and vile requestes, as AEmylius selfe could not abide to heare them: but knittinghis c browes against him, being hartely offended, he spake thus vnto him. Alas poore ma, why does thou discharge fortune of this faulte, where thou mightest justly charge and accuse her to the " discharge, doing things, for the which every one judgeth thou hast deserved thy present mile-" rie, & art vnworthie also of thy former honour? why dost thou defame my victorie, & blemsh " the glory of my doings, thewing thy felf to base a ma, as my honour is not great, to ouercome » fo vnworthie an enemie? The Romaines haue euer esteemed magnanimitie, euen in their , greatest enemies: but dastardlines, though it be fortunate, yet is it hated of euery bodie. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hande, gaue him into the custodie of Alius Tubero. Then AEmylius went into his tent, & caried his fonnes, & fonnes in law with him & other men of qualitie, and specially the youngerforte. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensiue with him self, not speaking a word: in so much as all the standers by, wondered much at the matter. In the ende, he beganne to enter into discourse & talke of fortune, & the vnconstancy of these worldly things, & sayed vnto them. Is there any man living, my friends, who having fortune at will, thould therefore boaft and glorie in the prosperitie of confiancie. , his doings, for that he hath coquered a contrie, cittie, or Realme: & not rather to feare the vnconstancie of fortune? who laying before our eyes, & all those that professe armes at this pre-" fent, so notable an example of the comon frayeltie of men, doth plainely teache vs to thincke. that there is nothing coltant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men maye thinke them felues affured, confidering that when they have ouercome others, then are they driven to mistrust fortune most, & to mingle feare & mistrust, with ioye of victorie: if they will wisely E consider the comon course of fatall destenie that altereth daylie, somtime fauoring one, otherwhile throwing down another?you see, that in an howers space we have trode vnder our feete, the house of Alexander the great: who hath bene the mightiest & most redouted prince of the world. You fee a King, that not log fince was followed & accopanied, with many thousand fouldiers of horsemen & footemen: brought at this present into such miserable extremitie, that he " is inforced to receive his meate & drinke daylie at the hands of his enemies . Should we have ,, any better hope then, that fortune will allwayes fauour our doings, more the she doth his now, at this present? no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter well, you young men I saye, , be not to bragge nor foolish prowde, of this conquest & noble victorie: but thinke what maye , happe hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuie of this our present prospe F , ritie, Such were Amylius words to these young men, as it is reported, bridling by these &cfuch " like perfuafions, the lufty brauery of this youth, even as with the bit & bridle of reason. AfterA wardes he put his armie into garrisons to refreshe them: and wenthim selfe in persone in the meane time to visite G B. E. C. E, making it an honorable progresse, and also a commendable. For ashe paffed through their citties, he releued the people, reformed the gouernment of their prografic in flate, and euer gaue them some gifte or present. Vnto some he gaue corne, which king Perseus Grace. had gathered for the warres: and vnto other he gaue oyles, meeting with so great store of prouision, that he rather lacked people to geue it vnto, to receyue it at his handes, then wanring to geue, there was so much. As he passed by the cittle of DELPHES, he sawe there a great piller, four efquare, of white stone, which they had set vp, to put king Perseus image of gold ypon it. Whereupon he commaunded them to fet vp his in that place, faying it was reason the conquered should geue place vnto the conquerours. And being in the cittie of OLYM-B PLA, visiting the temple of Impiter Olympian, he spake this openly, which euer fince hath bene remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Iupiter, as Homer had described him . Afterwardes the realme of MACEDON, he redeliuered the MACEDONIAN'S their countrie and townes a- AEmilia when the tenne ambaffadours were arrived that were fent from Rome to establish with him gaine, to line at libertie, according to their lawes, paying yerely to the Romaines for tribute, Janub Maahundred talents: where before they were wont to paye vnto their Kings tenne times as flage. muche. And he made playes and games of all fortes, and dyd celebrate fumptuous facrifices vnto the goddes. He kept open courte to all commers, and made noble feastes, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treasure Perseus had gathered together, sparing for no coste. But through his care and foresight there was suche a speciall good order taken, euery C man so curteously receyued and welcommed, and so orderly marshalled at the table according to their estate and calling: that the GRECIANS wondred to see him so carefull in matters of sporte and pleasure: and that he tooke as great paynes in his owne persone, to see that small matters should be ordered as they ought: as he tooke great regard for discharge of more weighty causes. But this was a maruelous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous fightes prepared to shewe pleasure to the persones inuited, no fight nor stately shewe dydio delight them, as to enjoye the fight and company of his persone. So he told them, that AEmilius feemed to wonder at his diligence and care in these matters: that to order a feast well, re- worder about quired as great judgement and discretion, as to fet a battell: to make the one fearefull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friendes. But men esteemed his bountie and magna-D nimitie for his best vertue and qualitie. For he dyd not only refuse to see the Kings wonderful treasure of golde and filuer, but caused it to be told, and delinered to the custodie of the treaabfilience. furers, to carie to the coffers of store in Rome: and only suffered his sonnes that were learned to take the bookes of the Kings librarie. When he dyd rewarde the fouldiers for their valliant service in this battell, he gave his sonne in lawe Amylius Tubero a cuppe, talents. It is the fame Tubero we tolde you of before, who lived with fixteene of kynne all in one house, and of the only reuenue they had of a litle farme in the countrie. Some saye, that cuppe was the first pece of plate that euer came into the house of the Alians, and yet it came for honour and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither them felues, nor their wines, would ener haue, or weare, any gold or filuer. After he had wery well ordered E and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leave of the GRECIANS, and counselled the MA-CEDONIANS to remember the libertie the ROMAINES had geuen them, and that they should be carefull to keepe it, by their good gouernment and concorde together. Then he departed from them, and tooke his iorney towardes the countrie of EPIRVS, having receyued commission from the Senate of Rome, to suffer his souldiers who had done service in the battell, and ouerthrowe of king Perseus, to spoyle all the citties of that countrie. Wherefore that he might furprise them on a sodaine, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the citties that they should send him by a certaine daye, tenne of the chiefest men of every cittie. Who when they were come, he commaunded them to goe and bring him by fuche a daye, all the golde and filuer they had within their citties, aswell in their private houses, as in their

F temples and churches, and gaue vnto euerie one of them a captaine and garrison with them, as if it had bene only to have receased and searched for the gold and silver he demaunded, But when the daye appointed was come, the fouldiers in divers places (and all at one time)

paye ransome every man: So as by this policie, there were taken and made slaves in one daye, a hundred and fittie thousand persones, and three score and tenne citties spoyled and facked euery one. And yet when they came to deuide the spoyle of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the polle, it came not to euery fouldiers parte, aboue eleuen filuer Drachmes a pece. Which made every one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terrour of the warres, to see the wealthe and riches of so great a Realme, to amounte to so line for every mans thare. When AEmylius had done this facte against his owne nature, which was very gentle and curteous: he went vnto the sea syde to the citty of ORICA, and there im-deale leffe then they looked for, they were marueloufly offended, and inwardly grudged AEmylius in their hartes. Neuertheles they durst not speake it openly, but dyd accuse him, that he had bene to straight vnto them in this warre, and therefore they dyd shewe no great

The Tribunes made him aunswer, that he should speake then what he had to saye against him, or otherwise they would not graunte him audience. Hereupon he beganne to make a long oration in his difpraise, full of railing wordes, and spent all the rest of the daye in that rayling oration. After n wardes when night came on, the Tribunes brake up the affembly, and the next morning the fouldiers being incoraged by Galbaes oration, and having confedered together, dyd flocke about Alba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had genen warning they c their affembly. Now being broade daye, AEmylius triumphe was referred to umber of voyces of the people, and the first tribe flattly dyd denie his triumphe. The Senate, and the refidue of the people hearing that, were very forie to fee they dyd Æmylius so open wrong and iniurie. The common people sayed nothing to it, but seemed to be very forie, howbeit they fought no redreffe. The lordes of the Senate cried out apon them, & fayd it was to much shame, and exhorted one another to bridell the insolencie and boldnes of these souldiers, who would growe in the ende to such tumulte and disorder, that they E would commit all mischief and wickednes, if betimes they were not looked to, and preuented, seeing they dyd so openly stand against their generall, seeking to depriue him of the honour of his triumphe and victorie. So they affembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would staye to take the voyces of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with fuch needefull matter, as they had to open Servillus ora- vnto them. The Tribunes graunted to it, and filence was made. Then Marcus Servillus, who had bene Conful, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne of AEmyliu persone, and had allwayes slaine as many of his enemies as chalenged him man for man; rose " vp, and spake in fauour of AEmylius in this manner. and graunted Æmylius triumphe: the order and solemnitie whereof was performed in this forte. First, the people having set vp sundrie scaffoldes, aswel in the listes & field called Circos Anorable de-D by the LATINES) where the games and common running of horses and charrets are made, as AEmplies also about the market place, and in other streetes of the cittie, through the which, the shewe wimphe. of the triumphe should passe: they all presented them selues in their best gownes to see the magnificence and state thereof. All the temples of the goddes also were set wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within; and there were fet through all the quarters of the cittle numbers of fergeaunts and other officers holding tipstaues in their hands to order the stragling people, and to keepe them vp in corners and lanes endes, that they should not peffer the streetes, & hinder the triumphe. Furthermore, the fight of this triumphe was to continue three dayes, whereof the first was scant sufficient to see the passing by of the images; tables, & pictures, & statues of wonderfull bignes, all wonne and gotten of their enemies, and E drawen in the (howe, ypon two hundred & fiftie charrets, The second days, there were carried vpon a number of cartes, all the fairest and richest armour of the MACE DOMEANS, aswell of copper, as also of iron and steele, all glistering bright, being newly furbished, and arteficially layed in order (and yet in fuch forte, as if they had bene caft in heapes one voon another, without taking any care otherwise for the ordering and laying of them) faver burganers vpon targets: habergions, or brigantines and corfelets, vpon greaues; rounde targets of the CREA TANS, and lauelings of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongeft the armed pykes: all this armour and carriage, being bound one to another fo trimly (neither being to dole, nor to straight) that one hitting against another, as they drue them woon the cartes through the cittie they made fuche a found and noyfe, as it was fearefull to heare it: fo that the only fight of thefe

F spoyles of the captives being overcome, made the fight so muche more terrible to behold it. After these carries loden with armour, there followed three thousand men, which carried the ready money in feuen hundred & fiftie veffels, which wayed about three talets a pece, & euery one of them were caried by foure men: & there were other that caried great bowles of filmer A cuppes & goblets facioned like hornes, & other pottes to drinke in, goodly to behold, aswelfor their bignes, as for their great & fingular imboffed workes about it. The third day early in the morning, the trupets beganne to found & fet forwardes, founding no marche nor fwete note to be a wrifte triumphe with all: but they blewe out the braue alarom they found at an affant. to geue the fouldiers corage for to fight. After them followed fixe score goodly fat oxen, bauing all their hornes gylte, & garlands of flowers & nofegayes about their heads, & there we by them certaine yong men, with aprons of nedle worke, girt about their midle, who led them to the facrifice, & young boyes with them also, that caried goodly basons of gold & filter, to cast & sprinkle the bloud of the sacrifices about. And after these stollowed those that carried all covnes of gold deuided by basons & vessels, & every one of them waying three talents as they h dyd before, that carried the great holy cuppe, which Emplies had caused to be made of math gold, fet full of precious flones, waying the weight of tenne talents, to make an offering vnto the godds. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made & wrought after antike facion, & notable cuppes of the auncient kings of MACED ON: as the cuppe called Antigonus & another Seleucus: & to be shorte, all the whole cubberd of plate of gold & filuer of king Perseu. And next them came the charret of his armour, in the which was all king Perfew harnefle, & his royall bande (they call a Diademe) upon his armour. And a litle space betweene them, fol-Perfess thit-lowed next the Kings children, whom they led prifoners, with the traine of their schoolemafters & other officers, & their feruaunts, weeping & lamenting: who held up their hands you the people that looked apon them, & taught the Kings young children to doe the like, to aske (mercie & grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two sonnes and daughter amongest them, whose tender yeres and lacke of understanding, made them (poore foules) they could not feele their present miserie, which made the people so muche more to pittie them, when they faw the poore litle infants, that they knew not the chauge of their hard fortune: fo that for the copassion they had of the, they almost let the father passe without losking vpon him Many peoples harts did melt for very pittie, that the teares ranne downe their cheekes, fo as this fight brought both pleasure & forow, together to the lookers on, vntill they were past & gone a good way out of fight. King Perfeus the father, followed after his children & their traine, & he was clothed in a blacke gowne, wearing a payer of flippers on his feete after his contrie maner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled minde, oppress with foron D of his most miserable state & fortune. He was followed with his kinsefolks, his familliar frends, his officers & household servants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lameting teares & forowfull eyes cast apon their vnfortunate master how much they forowed & bewailed his most hard & curfed fortune, litle accopting of their own miserie. The voice goeth, that Perfew fent vnto Emplius to intreate him, that he should not be led through the cittle in the showe & sight of the triuphe. But Amylius mocking (as he deserved) his cowfounds Per. ardly faint hart, aunswered: as for that, it was before, & is now in him, to doe if he wil, Meaning few corad- to let him vinderstad thereby, that he might rather chuse to dye, then living to receive such ope shame. How beit his hart would not ferue him, he was so cowardly, & made so effeminate, by a certen vaine hope he knew not what, that he was cotented to make one amog his own fpoiles. E Four budged After all this, there followed 400, princely crownes of golde, which the citties and townes of GRECE had purposly sent by their ambassadours vnto Æmylim, to honour his victorie: & next vnto the, he came him felfe in his charret triuphing, which was passing sumptuously set forth by the civiles & adorned. It was a noble fight to behold: & yet the person of him self only was worth the looking on without all that great pope & magnificece. For he was apparelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, & caried in his right hand a lawrell boughe, as all his armie did belids: the which being deuided by bands & copanies, followed the triuphing charret of their captains, fome of the fouldiers finging fonges of victorie, which the ROMAINES vie to finge in like triumphes, mingling the with mery pleasant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of the also dydfinge fongs of triuphe, in the honour & praise of Amylius noble coquest & victorie. He I was opely praifed, bleffed, & honored of every body, & neither hated nor enuied of honest me. Saving the ordinary vse of some god, whose propertie is allwayes to lessen or cut of some part of mans exceding prosperitie & felicitie, mingling with mans life the sence & feeling of good &euill together: bicause that no liuing persone should passe all his time of life, without some aduerlitie or misfortune, but that fuch (as Homer fayeth) should only thinke the selues happie, Alman to whom fortune hath equally forted the good with the cuill. And this I speake, bicause Amslius had 4. fonnes, two of the which he gaue in adoptio vnto the families of Scipio & of Fabius, as we have fayed before: & two other which he had by his fecod wife, be brought vp with him in his owne house, & were both yet very young. Of the which the one dyed, being 14. yeres of age fine dayes before his fathers triuphe: & the other dyed also, 3. dayes after the pompe of triumphe, at 12. yeres of age. When this sorowfull chance had befallen him, euery one in Roma did pittie him in their hartes: but fortunes spite & crueltie did more greue & feare them, to see R her litle regard towards him, to put into a house of triuphe (full of honour & glorie, & of sacrifices & joye) fuch a pittiefull mourning, & mingling of forowes & lamétations of death, amogest such songs of triumple & victorie. Notwithstading this, Æmylim taking things like a wise man, thought that he was not only to vie constacie & magnanimitie, against the sword & pike AEmplim man, thought that ne was not only to vie contacte & magnamintegy grant of the enemie: but a like also against all aduerstice and enmittee of spiteful fortune. So, he wisely fortune in the great adwaved & cosidered his present missortune, with his former prosperitie: & finding his missorrune coterpeased with felicitie, & his private grieues cut of with comon love, he gave no place to his forowes & mischaces, neither blemished any way the dignity of his triuphe & victorie. For when he had buried the eldest of his two last sonnes, he lest not to make his triuphant en- AEmylin otrie, as you haue heard before. And his fecod fonne also being deceased after his triumphe, he ration in ble caused the people to assemble, & in face of the whole cittie he made an oration, not like a difcoforted man, but like one rather that dyd coforte his forowfull contrymen for his mischace. his children. He told them, that concerning mens matters, neuer any thing dyd feare him: but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, mistrusting her chasige & incôstacy, & specially in the last warre, doubting for so great prosperitie as could be wished, to be payed home with an after intollerable aduersitie, & simister chaunce. For as I went (sayed he) I passed ouer the gulse of the Adriatike lea, from BRINDES vnto CORFV in one daye. And from thence in fine dayes after, I arriued in the cittie of Delphes, where I dyd facrifice vnto Apollo. And within fine other dayes, I arriued in my cape, where I found mine armie in MACEDON. And after I had done the facrifice, & due ceremonies for purifying of the fame, I presently begane to followe the purpose & D cause of my coming: so as in 15, dayes after, I made an honorable ende of all those warres. But yes, miltrusting fortune allwayes, seing the prosperous course of my affaires, & cosidering that there were no other enemies, nor daugers I neded to feare: I feared forely the would chaunge at my returne, when I should be voon the sea, bringing home so goodly & victorious an armie, with so many spoiles & so many Princes and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was safely arrived in the hauen, & feing all the cittie at my returne full of ioye, & of feastes & facrifices: I still suspected fortune, knowing her manner well enough, that she vieth not to gratifie men fo franckly, nor to graunt them fo great things clearly, without some certen sparke of entile waiting on them. Neither dyd my minde being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the comon wealth, thake of this feare behind me: but that I fawe, this home mithappe & miferie lighted vpo me, enforcing me with mine owne hands in these holy dayes of my tritiphe, to butie my two young fonnes one after another, which I only brought vp with me, for the fuecession of my name & house. Wherefore, me thinkes now I may saye, I am out of all dauger, at the least touching my chiefest & greatest misfortune: & doe beginne to stablish my selfe with this affured hope that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with vs euermore, without " feare of other valueky or finister chaunce. For she hath sufficiently contervalled the fauorable victorie the gaue you, with the enuious mishappe wherewith the hath plagued both me and mine: shewing the coquerour & triupher, as noble an exaple of mans miserie & weaknes, as the party coquered, that had bene led in triuphe. Sauing that Perfess yet, conquered as he is, hath this coforte left him to fee his childre living, & that the coquerour Amylius hath loft his. And F this was the fumme of Amylius notable oration he made vinto the people of Rome, proceeding of a noble & honorable disposed minde, And though it pittied him in his harte to see the straunge chaunge of king Perseus fortune, and that he hartely desired to helpe him, and to doe

the Syracufas before Timoleens coming.

DEFORE Timoleon was fent into Sicile, thus stoode the state of A the SYRACVSANS. After that Dion had driven out the tyranne Dinmysius, he him selfe after was slaine immediatly by treason: and those that ayded him to restore the SYRACYSANS to their libertie, fell out, and were at diffention among them felues . By reason whereof, the cittle of SYRACVSA chaunging continually newe tyrannes, was to troubled and turmoiled with all forte of euills, that it was left in manner desolate, and without inhabitants. The rest of Sicile in like case was vtterly destroyed, and no citties in manner left standing, by reason of the long warres: and those fewe that remained, were most inhabited of forreine souldiers& straungers (a company of lose men gathered together that tooke paye of no prince nor cittie) } all the dominions of the same being easely vsurped, and as easie to chaunge their lorde. In so muche, Dionysius the tyranne, tenne yeres after Dion had driven him out of Sicile, having gathered a certen number of fouldiers together againe, and through their helpe driven out Niseus, that raigned at that time in Syrac vs A: he recouered the Realme againe, and made him felfe King. So, if he was straungely expulsed by a small power out of the greatest Kingdome that ever was in the worlde: likewise he more straungely recovered it againe, being banished and very poore, making him selfe King ouer them, who before had driven him out Thus were the inhabitants of the cittie compelled, to serue this tyranne: who besides that of his owne nature he was neuer curteous nor civill, he was now growen to be farre more dogged and cruell, by reason of the extreme miserie and missortune he had endured. But the no- C blest cittizens repaired vnto leetes, who at that time as lorde ruled the cittie of the LEON-TINES, and they chose him for their generall in these warres: not for that he was any thing better then the open tyrannes, but bicause they had no other to repaire vnto at that time, & they trusted him best, for that he was borne (as them selues) within the cittie of SYRACVSA,& bicause also he had men of warre about him, to make head against this tyranne. But in the

meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great armie, and inuaded the countrie. The SYRACYSANS being afrayed of them, determined to fend ambassa-

NEIANS, Timoleon ferued as a private fouldier amongest the footemen: and Timophanes his brother, having charge of horsemen, was in great daunger of being cast away, if present helpe had not bene . For his horse being hurte, threwe him on the grounde in the middest of his enemies. Whereupon parte of those that were about him, were affrayed, and dispersed them selues here and there: and those that remained with him, being fewe in number, and having many enemies to fight withall, dyd hardly withstand their force and charge. But his brother Timoleon feeing him in fuche inftant daunger a farre of, ranne with all speede possible to helpe him, and clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that laye on the grounde, received uing many woundes on his bodie with fworde and arrowes, with great difficultie he repulfed F the enemies, and faued his owne and his brothers life. Now the CORINTHIAN'S fearing the Timoleon falike matter to come that before had happened vnto them, which was to lofe their cittle ned his break through default of their friends helpe: they resolved in counsell, to entertaine in paye conti-

TIMOLEON A dours into GRECE vinto the Corinthians, to praye ayde of them against the barbatous people, having better hope of them, then of any other of the GRECIANS. And that not altogether bicause they were lineally descended from them, and that they had received in times pass many pleasures at their handes: but also for that they knewe that CORINTHE was a cittle. that in all ages and times, dyd euer loue libertie, and hate tyrannes, and that had allwayes made their greatest warres, not for ambition of Kingdomes, nor of couctous defire to conquer and rule, but only to defend and mainteine the libertie of the GRECIANS. But leetes in another contrarie forte, he tooke apon him to be generall, with a minde to make him felfe king of Sx+ RACVS A. For he had secretly practifed with the CARTHAGINIANS, and openly notwithstanding in words he commended the counsell and determination of the SYRACYS ANS, and fent ambassadours from him selse also with theirs, vnto Peloponnesvs: not that he was desirous any ayde should come from them to Syracvsa, but bicause he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refused to fend them ayde (as it was very likely they would, for the warres and troubles that were in GR ECE) that he might more easely turne all over to the CARTHAGINIANS, and vie them as his friendes, to ayde him against the SYRAGVSANS, or the tyrante Dionysius, And that this was his full purpose, and intent, it appeared plainely sone after. Now when their ambassadours arrived at CORINTHE, & had delivered their meffage, the CORINTHIANS, who had euer bene carefull to defend fuch citties as had fought vnto them, & specially Syrac vs a: very willingly determined in counfaill to fend them ayde, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, having warres with none of the GRECIANS. So their only flave reflect, pon chooling of a generall to leade their armie. Now as the magistrates and gouernours of the cittie were naming fuche cittizens, as willingly offred their feruice, defirous to addiaunce mon weale: and was allwayes gentle and curteous to all men, fauing that he mortally hated

D tyrantes and wicked men . Furthermore nature had framed his bodie apt for warres and for friendes, and by certen fouldiers gathered together, which he had allwayes about him. And bicaule he was very hotte and forward in warres, his cittizens tooke him for a noble captaine,

& a man of good feruice, and therefore oftentimes they gaue him charge of men. And therein

Timoleon dyd helpe him muche to hide his faulte he committed, or at the least made them feeme leffe, & lighter then they were, still increasing that small good gifte that nature brought forth in him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had against the ARGIVES and the CLEO.

them felues: there ftept vp a meane commoner, who named Timoleon, Timodemus fonne, a man that untill that time was neuer called on for feruice, neither looked for any fuche prefarment. By what voice And truely it is to be thought it was the fecret working of the gods, that directed the thought Timoleon of this meane commoner to name Timoleon: whose election fortune fauored very much, and generall. ioyned to his valliantnes and vertue, maruelous good successe in all his doings afterwardes.

This Timoleon was borne of noble parents, both by father and mother: his father was called Timoleons Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to loue his countrie and com-paynes: he was wife in his grenest youth in all things he tooke in hande, and in his age he thewed him felfe very valliant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing Timophanes, like to him in condition: for he was a rashe harebraynd man, & had a greedy desire to reigne, brother, what being put into his head by a companie of meane men, that bare him in hande they were his he was

Who, abandoning all honestie and regarde of the trust reposed in him, dyd presents practife all the waves he could to make him felfe lorde of the cittie; and having put diversity the chiefest cittizens to death without order of lawe, in the ende, he openly proclaimed him felfe King. Timoleon being very forie for this, and taking his brothers wickednes would be the very highe wave to his fall and destruction: sought first to winne him with all the good work and perfusion he could to move him to leave his ambitious defire to reigne, and to faluer at neere as might be) his harde dealing with the cittizens. Timophanes fet light by his brother cruelty, to v. perfugions, and would geue no eare vnto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went vnto one the kingdom. and grew into great choller with them. Timoleon feeing that, went a litle a tofide, and couring his face fell a weeping: and in the meane feafon, the other two drawing out their fwordes flue Timophanes in the place. This murder was straight blowen abroade through the cittie, and the better forte did greatly commend the noble minde and hate Timoleon bare against the tyrante confidering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kinne, dyd notwithstanding regard the benefit of his countrie, before the naturall affection to his brother, and preferred duery and justice, before nature and kinred. For, before he had faued his brothers life, fighting (for defence of his countrie: and now in feeking to make him felfe King, and to rule the fame. he made him to be flaine. Suche then as misliked popular gouernment and libertie, and all waves followed the Nobilitie: they fet a good face of the matter, as though they had beneglad of the tyrantes death. Yet still reprouing Timoleon for the horrible murder he had committed against his brother, declaring howe detestable it was both to the gods and men: they so hand led him, that it grieved him to the harte he had done it, But when it was told him that his mother tooke it maruelous euill, and that the pronounced horrible curfes against him, and game out terrible wordes of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her; howbeit she could neuer abide to fee him, but allwayes thut her doore againft him. Then he being wounded to the harte with forowe, tooke a conceit fodainly to kill him felfe by absteining from meate: but his] friends would neuer forfake him in this defpaire, and vrged him fo farre by intreaty and perfuafion, that they compelled him to eate. Thereupon he refolued thenceforth to give him felf ouer to a folitarie life in the countrie, fecluding him felfe from all companie and dealings so as at the beginning, he dyd not only refuse to repaire vnto the cittie, and all accesse of companie, but wandring vp and downe in most solitarie places, confumed him selfe and his time with melancholie. And thus we fee, that counfells and judgements are lightly caried awaye

And therefore it is very requifite and necessarie, that not only the acte be good and honest of it selfe, but that the resolution thereof be also constant, and not fubiect vnto chaunge: to the ende we maye doe all things confideratly. Left we be like vnto imagination, of the honestie that moved vs thereunto. For repentaunce maketh the acte which before was good, naught, But determination, grounded upon certaine knowledge and truthe of reason, doth neuer chaunge, although the matter enterprised, have not allways happy successe. And therefore Phocion the ATHENIAN having resisted (as muche as in him laye) certen things which the generall Leosthenes dyd, and which contrarie to his minde took good effect: and perceyuing the ATHENIANS dyd open facrifice vnto the goddes, to gent them thankes for the same, and muche rejoyce at the victorie they had obteined. I would have reioyced to (fayed he) if I had done this : but fo would I not for any thing , but I had gener ! the counsell. And within a certayne tyme after, the tyranne put all his sonnes to deathe: and then he asked him in derision, to greeue him the more, if he were still of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very forye, (fayed he) with all my harte, for that thou hast done: but yet I doe not repent me of that I have sayed. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe to Timoleon. Whether that inwarde forowe strooke him to the harte for the deathe of his brother, or that shame did so hashhim, as he durst not abide his mother: twenty yeares after, he neuer did any notable or famous acte. And therefore, when he was named to be generall of the ayde that shoulde be Timole chofentinto Sicile, the people having willingly chosen and accepted of him: Teleslides, who sengenced to

For, sayd he, if you handle your selfe well, we will thinke you have killed a tyranne: but if you doe order your selfe otherwise then well, we will judge you have killed your brother . Nowe Timoleon being bufie in leavying of men gand preparing him felfe: letters came to the CORINTHIAN'S from Icetes, whereby plainely appeared, Icetes pran that letter had caried two faces in one hoode, and that he was become a traytor. time, as having croffed the feas, they arrived vpon the coast of ITALIE. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderstoode from SICILE put Timoleon in great perplexitie, and did maruelously discourage the souldiers he brought with him. For Icetes having overthrowe the battell of the tyranne DIONY SIV s, and possessed the greatest parte of the citie of SYRACE. sa: he did befeege him within the caftell, and within that parte of the citie which is called the Ile, where he had pent him up, and inclosed him in with walles rounde about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe The moleon from landing in SICILE, to the ende that by preuenting that ayde, they might easily deuide Sicila betwene them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS follow- B ing his request, sent twenty of their gallyes vnto RHEOIO, amonge which Iceres Ambassa testes fendeth dors were fent to Timoleon, with testimonie of his doinges: for they were fayer flattering Ambassadors wordes, to cloke his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timoleon he shoulde goe him selse alone (if he thought good) vnto leetes, to counsell him, and to accompanie him in all his doinges, which were nowe fo farre onwardes in good towardnes, as he hadalmost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also perswade him, he shoulde send backehis shippes and fouldiers to CORINTHE agayne, considering that the warre was nowe brought to good passe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS woulde in no case that his men should passe into Sicile, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORINTHIANS at their arrivall into the citie of RHEGIO, finding there C these Ambassadors, and seeing the seete of the CARTHAGINIANS shippes, which did ryde at ancker not farre of from them: it spyted them on the one side to see they were thus mocked and abused by Icetes. For every one of them were marvelous angrye with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore SICILIANS, whome to playnely they fawe left a praye vnto leetes for rewarde of his treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyrannie, which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other side they thought it impossible to concouer the shippes of the CARTHAGINIANS, which laye in wayte for them, and so neare vnto them: confidering they were twyse as many in number as they and hard for them to subdue the armie also that was in the handes of Icetes in Sicile, confidering that they were not come to him, but onely for the mayntenaunce of the warres, Not-D withstanding, Timoleon spake very curteously vnto those Ambassadors, and captaynes of the sierthen the CARTHAGINIANS shippes, letting them vnderstande that he would doe as much as they would have him: and to fay truely, if he woulde have done otherwife, he could have wome nothing by it. Neuertheles he defired for his discharge, they woulde say that openly, in the presence of the people of RHEGIO, (being acitie of GREECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had spoken to him in secrete: and that done, he would departe incomnently, alledging that it stoode him very much vppon for the safetie of his discharge, and that they them selves also should more faithfully keepe that they promised vnto him touching the SYRACVS ANS, when they had agreed vponit, and promised it, before all the people of RHEo I o, who should be witnes of it. Now, all this was but a fetche and policie deliuered by him, E to shadowe his departure, which the Captaines and gouerners of RHEGIO did fauor, and feeme to helpe him in: bicause they wished SICILE should fall into the handes of the Co-RINTHIANS, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cause they commaunded a generall assembly of all the people, during which tyme, they caused the gates of the citie to be shut: geuing it out, that it was bicause the Citizens should not goe about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the people were affembled they beganne to make long orations without concluding any matter: the one leaving alwayes to the other a like matter to talke of to the ende they might winne time, vntill the gallyes of the Co-RINTHIANS were departed. And staying the CARTHAGINIANS also in this affemblye, they mistrusted nothing, bicause they sawe Timoleon present: who made a countenaunce, F as though he wouldery se to say something. But in the meane tyme, some one did secretely aduertife Timoleon, that the other gallyes were vnder fayle, and gone their wave, and that there was but one galley left, which taried for him in the hauen. Thereupon he fodainly stale away through the prease, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chayer where the orations were made: and trudging quickly to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hove fed faile alfo. And when he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all fafe together to lande at the Timoleon /2citie of TAVROMENION, which is in SICILE: there they were very well received by Andromachus who long before had fent for them for he gouerned this citie, as if he had bene Lorde sieile, thereof. He was the father of Timaus the Historiographer, the honestest man of all those that did beare rule at that time in all SICILE. For he did rule his Citizens, in all inflice and equitie, Time us he and did alwaies shew him selfe an open enemy of tyrans. And following his affection therein, Historiograhe lent his citie at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together, and perferaded his Citient of the citi rensto enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to ayde them, to deliver SICILE in of Tairie from bondage, and to restore it agains to libertie. But the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS menion that were at RHB GIO, when they knewe that Timoleon was vnder fayle and gone, after the affemblie of the counfell was broken uppe: they were ready to eate their fingers for fpyte, to fee them selues thus finely mocked and deceived. The RHEGIANS on the other side, were mery at the matter, to see howe the Phenicians stormed at it, that they had such a fine parte played them. Howbeit in the ende, they determined to fend an Ambassador vnto T a v-ROMENION, in one of their gallyes. This Ambassadorspake very boldely, and barbarously The Carthe vnto Andromachus, and in a choller: and last of all, he shewed him first the palme of his giman Amhande, then the backe of his hande, and did threaten him that his citie shoulde be so turned threatens of Couer hand, if he did not quickly fend away the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell a laugh-define the ciing at him, and did turne his hande uppe and downe as the Ambaffador had done, and bad the of Tamos. him that he should get him going, and that with speede out of his citie, if he would not see the keele of his galley turned vpward . Icetes nowe vnderstanding of Timoleons comming, and dromach the being affrayed, fent for a great number of gallyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the palme and backe of his SYRACVS ANS beganne to despayre veterly, when they sawe their hauen full of the CAR- hand THAG INI ANS galleyes, the best parte of their citie kept by Icetes, and the castell by the tyran Dionysius. And on thother side, that Timoleon was not yet comen but to a litle corner of SICILE, having no more but the litle citie of TAVROMENION, with a small power, and

Sicil at libertie, and to drive out the tyrans: and yet nevertheles they had done so much hurte vnto the poore SICILIANS, that the miferie and calamitie which they had fuffered under the tyrans, feemedall to be golde unto them, in respect of that which the Captaines had made them to abyde. And they did not thinke them more happy, that had willingly submitted them felues vnto the voke of feruitude: then those which they sawe restored, and see atlibertie. Therefore perswading them selves, that this CORINTHIAN woulde be no better vnto them, then the other had bene before, but supposing they were the selfe same former craftes, and alluring baytes of good hope and fayer wordes, which they had tafted of before, to drawe them to accept newe tyrans: they did fore suspectit, and rejected all to Timoleon. So it fortuned, that bothe the one and the other, making all the possible leetes had about five thowfande fouldiers. Timoleon had not in all, aboue twelve hundred men, with the which he departed to goe towards the citie of ADRANYS, distant from TAV-ROMENION, about three hundred and fortiefurlonges. For the first dayes iorney, he went leffe hope: bicaufe there was not aboue athowfand footemen in all, to furnishe these warres. D neither prouision of vittells, nor so much money as woulde serue to entertayne and pay them. Besides also, that the other cities of Sigila did nothing trust him. But by reason of the violent extorcions they had alate suffered, they hated all Captaines and leaders of men of warre to the deathe, and specially for the tretcherie of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDEMONIAN. Both of them fayed they came to fet

When night was come, and day light shut in, he had newes that Isetes did ber newly arrive before ADRANY s, where he encamped. When the private captaines vnderstood this they caused the voward to stay, to eate & repose a litle, that they might be the lustier, & the stronger to fight. But Timoleon did fet still forwards, & prayed them not to stay, but to goe on with all the speede they could possible, that they might take their enemies out of order (asir was likely they (hould) being but newly arrived, & troubled with making their cabbons, & preparing for supper. Therewithall as he spake these wordes, he tooke his target on his arme, and marched him felfe the formost man, as brauely and coragiously as if he had gon to a most assured victorie. The fouldiers feeing him marche with that life; they followed at his heeles with like corage. So they had not passing thirty furlonges to goe, which when they had ouercomen, they straight set apontheir enemies, whome they found all out of order, and began to five, fo made him five foone as they faw they were vpon their backes before they were aware. By this meanes there were not about three hundred men flayne, and twife as many moe taken prisoners, and so their whole campe was possessed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yelded vnto Timeto Timoleon.

This (in my opinion) did not onely fignifie the victorie he had gotten at that time, but all the notable exploytes he did afterwardes, vnto the which, this first encounter gaue a happye beginning. For immediate of after, many cities fent vnto Timoleon, to ioyne in league with him. And Mamercus, thery.

Furthermore, Dionysius the tyran of Syracvsa, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding him felfe in maner forced vnto it by long continuaunce of feige: made no more reckoning of Icetes, when he knewe that he was to shamefully ouerthrowen. And contrariwife, much esteeming Timoleons valiantnes, he sent to advertise him, that he was contented to velde him felfe and the castell into the handes of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good happe vnlooked for, fent Euclides and Telemachus, two Captaines of the Co-RINTHIANS, to take possession of the castell, with sowre hundred men, not all at a tyme. deth him felfe nor openly (for it was unpossible, the enemies lying in wayte in the hauen) but by small com-n and the castell panies, and by stellhe, he conveyed them all into the castell. So the souldiers possessed the castell, and the tyrans pallace, with all the moueables and municion of warres within the unto Timotefame. There were a great number of horse of service, great store of staues and weapons of fensive of all fortes, and engynes of batterie to shoote farre of, and fundry other weapons of defence, that had bene gathered together of long tyme, to arme threefcore and tenne thowfand men. Moreouer, besides all this, there were two thowsand souldiers, whome withall the other thinges rehearled, Dionysius deliuered vp into the handes of Timoleon: and he him felfe, with his money and a few of his friendes, went his way by fea, Icetes not knowing it, and so came to Timoleons campe. This was the first tyme that ever they sawe Dionysius a private man, in base and meane estate. And yet within sewe dayes after, Timoleon sent him from E tyran of Sy-racufa fens to thence vnto Corinthia fhippe, with litle flore of money. Who was borne and brought vp in the greatest and most famous tyrannie, and kingdome, conquered by force, that ener was in the world: and which him felfe had kept by the space of tenne yeares after the death of his father. Since Dion draue him out, he had bene marueloufly turmoyled in warres, by the space of twelve yeares: in which time, although he had done much emischiese, yet he had fuffered also a great deale more. For he sawe the death of his sonnes when they were men growen, and able to ferue and cary armor. He faw his daughters rauished by force, & deflow-& calamities of Dionyfiue red of their virginitie. He faw his owne fifter (who was also his wife) first of all shamed, & cruelly handled in her person, with the greatest villanies & most vile partes done vnto her, that his enemies could deuise: & afterwards horribly murdered with his childre, & their bodies in the I a rogo fee him, and to talke with him. And some went thither very glad of his querthrow, as if Dionystus they had troden him downe with their feete, whom fortune had ouerthrowen, so bitterly did Gorindia. they hate him. Other pittiyng him in their heartes, to fee fo great a chaunge, did behold him as it were with a certaine compassion, considering what great power, secret and divine causes

For the world then, did neuer bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand fo wonderful. as was this of fortune. Who made the world fee a man, that before was in maner Lorde and The Incom-King of all Sicile, fit then commonly in the cittie of CORINTHE, talking with a virailer, or flancie of for-

Now fome fay he did this, bicaufe he knew not els how he should drive the time away, for that in dede he was of a base mynde, and an effeminate person, given over to all dishonest lusts and desires. Other are of opinio, he did it to be the lesse regarded, for feare lest the Corinthians (hould have him in gealouzy and sufficient, Imagining that he did take the chaunge and state of his lyfe in grieuous part, and that he should yet looke backe, hoping for a tyme to recouer his state againe: and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose fained many thinges against his nature, feeming to be a starke nideotte, to see him do those thinges he did. Some not withstanding have gathered together certaine of his answers, which doe testifie that he did not all these thinges of a base brutish mynde, but to fitte himselfe onely to his present misery and mis-

For when he came to LEVCADES, an auncient cittle built by the CORINTHIANS, as was also the citty of Syracvs'a: he told the inhabitants of the same, that he was like to yong Motable Say boyes that had done a fault. ly I thanke thee (Diogenes) that thou hast compassion of my misery. Why sayd Diogenes againe : Doest thou thinke I pitty thee ? Nay it spiteth me rather to see such a slaue as thou Dimpsiu the (worthy to dye in the wicked state of a tyrant like thy father) to lyue in such securitie, and idle prane. lyfe, as thou leadest amongst vs. When I came to compare these wordes of Diogenes, with Philistus wordes the Historiographer, bewailing the harde fortune of the daughters of the F LEPTINES, faying that they were brought from the toppe of all worldly felicity, honor, and goodes, (whereof tyrannicall state aboundeth) vnto a base, private, and humble life: me thinkes they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that foroweth for the loffe of her BB iii

So, me thinkes these things I have intermingled concerning Dionylius, are not impartinent to the description of our lines, neither are they troublesom nor ynprofitable to the hearers, oneles they have other hafty busines to let or trouble them. But now if the tyraunt Dionylius wretched state seeme straunge, Timoleons prosperitie then was no leffe wonderfull. For within fiftie dayes after he had fet foote in Sicile, he had the caffel of SYRACY SA in his possession, and sent Dionysius as an exile to CORINTHE. This did set the Co. RINTHIANS in suchea iollitie, that they fent him a supply of two thousand footemen, and two hundred horsemen, which were appointed to land in ITALIE, in the countrie of the Thy. RIANS. And percevuing that they could not possible goe from thence into Sicile, bicause the CARTHAGINIANS kept the leas with a great naule of thippes, and that thereby they were n compelled to flave for better oportunitie: in the meane time they bestowed their leylure in

So apon this, they came into the temple, having daggers under their gownes, & by litle and litle thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the aulter. But at the present time as one encoraged another to dispatche the matter, a third pertone they thought not of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his sworde, thathe fell to the grounde. But Icetes having missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daylie drawen to Timoleons denotion: he was mad with him self, that having fo great an armie of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commaundement, he tooke but a fewe of them to ferue his turne, as if he had bene ashamed of his facte, and hadvfed their frendshippe by stelth. So he sent hereupon for Mago their generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his request brought an huge army to see to, of a hundred and fiftie sayle, which occupied and couered all the hauen: and afterwards landed three fcore thousand men, whom he F lodged enery man within the cittle of Syracvsa. Then enery man imagined the time was now come, which olde men had threatned SICILE with many yeres before, and that conti-

For in all the warresthe CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the countrie of SICILE, they could neuer come to take the cittle of Syrac vsa: and then through Icetes treason, who had receyned them, they were seene encamped there. On thother side, the Corinth ins that were within the castell, founde them selues in great distresse, bicause their vittells waxed scant, and the hauen was fo straightly kept. Moreouer, they were driven to be armed continually to defend the walles, which the enemies battered, and affaulted in fundry places, with all kyndes of engines of batterie, and fundry fortes of deutled instruments and inventions to take citties: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to deuide them selues into many companies. Neuertheles. Timoleon without gaue them all the ayde he could possible: sending them come B from CATANA, in litle fisher botes and small crayers, which got into the castell many times. but specially in storme and fowle weather, passing by the gallyes of the barbarous people, that lave scatteringly one from another, dispersed abroad by tempest, and great billowes of the lea. But Mago and Icetes finding this, determined to goe take the cittie of CATANA, from diers of all their armie, they departed from Syracvsa, and fayled towardes Catana. Nowe in the meane space, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all those that were within the castell, Leon captains perceyning the enemies within the cittle kept but flender warde: made a fodaine falle out of the comapon them, and taking them vnwares, flue a great number at the first charge, and draue awaye the castell. the other. So by this occasion he wanne a quarter of the cittie, which they call ACRADINA, Leon wanne and was the best parte of the cittie, that had receyued least hurte. For the cittie of Syracys A Acradina. feemeth to be built of many townes joyned together. So having found there great plenty of come, golde, and filuer, he would not for fake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the castell: but fortifying with all diligence the compasse and precinct of the same, and ioy-ning it vnto the castell with certen fortifications he built vp in haste, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Icetes very neere vnto CATANA, when a post the two thousand Corinthians being arrived through the countrie of the BRYTIANS in the citie of R HE G I O, perceyuing the coaste cleare, and that the passage by sea was not kept, &

f that the raging feas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpofe calme for them: they tooke feas forthwith in fuch fither boates & paffengers as they found readie, in the which they went the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondred, and returned backe againe with all speede possible (having failed of their purpose they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their handes. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it vnto D wisedome and valliancie, or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opi- comemion of nion, is altogether to be ascribed with fortune. And this it is. The two thousand sootemen and forme and two hundred horsemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the cittle of the THVRIANS. Valliancie.

partly for feare of the gallyes of the CARTHAGINIANS that laye in wayte for them as they should passe, Hanno being their admirall: and partly also for that the sea was very rough and their passage, thought with him selfe that he had deuised a maruelous fine policie, to deceyue E the enemies. Thereuppon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumphe vpon their heades, and therewithall also made them dreffe vp, and fet forth his gallyes, with targets, The firstecorfelets, and brigantines after the GRECIANS facion. So in this brauery he returned backe Hanno the againe, failing towards Syracvs a, & came in with force of owers, rowing under the castells admiral of fide of Syracvsa, with great laughing, and clapping of hands: crying out alowde to them the Carthagithat were in the castell, that he had ouerthrowen their ayde which came from Corint HE, as gest their boates with them. When they were all passed ouer, Timoleon having received them, A went immediatly to take MESSINA, and marching thence in battell raye, tooke his way tocheth to Syra- wards Syra-cv sa, trusting better to his good fortune, then to his force he had: for his whole number in all, were not about foure thowfand fighting men, Notwithstanding, Mago hearing of his comming, quaked for feare, & dowted the more vpon this occasion. About Syracvsa are certeyne marishes, that receive great quantitie of sweete fresh water, aswell of sountaines and springes, as also of litle ronning brookes, lakes, & rivers, which ronne that wayes towards the sea: and therefore there are great store of eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all tymes, but specially for such as delite to take celes. Whereuppon the GRECIANS that tooke paye on both fides, when they had leyfure, and that all was quiet betwene them, they intended fishing. Now, they being all contrey men, and of one language, had no private quarrell one with an other: but when tyme was to fight, they did their duties, and in tyme of peace also frequented familiarly togither, and one spake with an other, and specially when they were bufie fishing for celes: faying, that they maruelled at the scituacion of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they stoode so pleasauntly and commodious apon the sea side. So one of the fouldiers that ferued vnder the CORINTHIANS, chaunced to fay vnto them Is it possible that you that be GRECIANS borne, and have so goodly a citie of your owne, & full of so many goodly commodities: that ye will give it vppe vnto these barbarous people, the vile CAR-THAG INIAN s, and most cruell murderers of the worlde? where you should rather wishe that there were many Sicilies betwixt them and Greece. Haue ye so litle consideration or iudgement to thinke, that they have affembled an armie out of all A FRICKE, vnto Hercules (pillers, and to the fea ATLANTICKE, to come hether to fight to stablish leetes tyrannie? who,

if he had bene a wife and skilfull Captaine, would not have cast out his auncestors & founders. to bringe into his contrye the auncient enemies of the fame: but might have received such honor and authoritie of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reasonably have desired, and that with all their fauor and good wil. The fouldiers that heard this tale, reported it against in their campe: Infomuch they made Mago suspect there was treason in hand, and so sought fome culler to be gon. But hereuppon, not with standing that Icetes prayed him all he could to tary, declaring vnto him how much they were stronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuayle by his hardines and good fortune, then exceede him in number of men: yet he hoysed sayle, and returned with shame enough into A FRICKE, letting slyppe the con-D quest of all Sicile out of his handes, without any fight of reason or cause at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon presented battell before the citie, when the GRECIANS and he vnderstoode that the CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they saw the hauen ryd of all the shippes: and then beganne to least at Magoes cowardlines, and in derision proclaymed in the citie, that they would give him a good reward that could bringe them newes, whether the ar-

leaue the spoyle he had gotten, but defende the quarters of the citie he had possessed, at the fwordes poynt, trusting to the strength and scituacion of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceyuing that, deuided his armie, and he with one parte thereof did fett vpon that fide which was the hardest to approache, and did stand vpon the river of ANA-E P v s: then he appoynted an other part of his armie to affault all at one time, the fide of ACRA-DINA, whereof Ilias CORINTHIAN had the leading. The thirde parte of his armie that came last from CORINTHE, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led: he appoynted to affault the quatter called Epipo LES. Thus, affault being given on all fides at one time, Icetes bandes of men were broken, and rannetheir way. Now that the citie was thus wonne by affault, and come to neth the citie fod aynely to the handes of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled: it is good reason we ascribe it to the valiantnes of the fouldiers, and the captaines great wisedom. But where there was not one Corinthian flayne, nor hurt in this affault: fure me thinkes herein, it was onely the worke and deede of fortune, that did fauor and protect Timoleon, to contende against his valiantnes. To the ende that those which should hereafter heare of his doings, should have more to occasion to wonder at his good happe: then to prayle and commend his valiantnes. For the fame of this great exployte, did in few dayes not onely ronnethrough all ITALYE, but also

Infomuch as the CORINTHIANS, (who could frant beleeve their men were passed with safetie into SICILB) understoode withall that they were safely arrived there. and had gotten the victorie of their enemies: so prosperous was their iorney, & fortune so spedely did fauor his noble actes. Timoleon having now the castellof S TRACVS ain his hands did not followe Dian. For he spared not the castell for the beawtie and stately building thereof, but anovding the suspicion that caused Dion first to be accused, and lastly to be slaying: he caused it tobe proclaymed by trompett, that any SYRACVSAN whatfoever, should come with crowes fewedayes; and made all playne: Timoleon at the fute of the Citizens, made counfell halls, and receased every mans most noble praise and blessing, aswell for delivering Sicilia in that forte

There Timelenes was not a man in all the citie of S YRAC V S X, but went thither ftraight, and thought that pro- wenterough clamacion and day to be a most happy beginning, of the recourrie of their libertie. So they did she castell of notonely overthrowe the castell, but the pallace also, and the tombes: and generally all that ferued in any respect for the memorie of any of the tyrans. And having cleared the place in places of inflice to be built there: and did by this meanes stablish a free state and popular gonernment, and did suppresse all tyrannicall power. Nowe, when he sawe he had wonne a citie Timoleon that had no inhabitants, which warres before had confumed, and feare of tyrannic had emptied so as graffe grewe so highe and rancke in the great markett place of SYRACVSA, as they sapopular grased their horses there, and the horsekeepers laye downe by them on the grasse as they fed: and that all the cities, a fewe excepted, were full of redde deare and wilde bores, so that men ble flate of

Besides, that they looked also for great warres out of A FRICKE being aduertised that the CARTHAGINIAN'S had honge up the body of Mago their general upon a croffe (who Mago flut hadflayne him felfe for that he could not aunswere the dishonor layed to his charge) and that him felfe, be-D they did leavy another great mightie armie, to return e againe the next yere following, to make ing called to warres in Sicile. Neuertheles, such Sicilians asrepayred to Corinthe aponthis proclamacion (them scheeng but a small number to inhabite the contrye) besought the CORINTHIANS to Figure to them some other inhabitantes, aswell of Corinth itselfe, as out of the rest of GREECE: the which was performed. When he had brought this to passe, he returned forthwith to SY RACVSA about the stablishment of the common weale, affisting Cephalus and Dionysius, two notable men fent from CORINTHE to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to stablishe the goodliest

For in deede it was an able armie to ouercome all the Sicilians, if they had bene whole of them selves, and not divided. Now they being advertised that the Sicilian's had invaded their contrye, they went towards them in great furie, led by Adrubal & Amilear, generalls of the armie. This news was straight brought to Synac vs a, and the inhabitants were so striken with feare of thereport of their armie: that being a maruelous great number of them within the citie, cant three thowfand of them had the hartes to armethem selves, and to goe to the fielde with Timoleon. Now the straungers that tooke pay, were not about four thowsand in all: & of them, a thowfand of their hartes fayled, and left him in midd way, and returned home againe. Saying, that Timoleon was out of his wittes, and more rashe then his yeares required, to vndertake with fine thow fand footemen. & a thow fand horse, to goe against threescore and tenne thow fand men and befides to cary that small force he had to defend him felfe withal eight great dayes jorney from S Y R A C V S A. So, that if it chaunced they were compelled to flye, they had no place whe ther they might retyre them selues vnto with safetie, nor man that woulde take care to burve them, when they were flavne. Neuertheles, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, having incoraged those that remayned with him, he made them marche with speede towards the river of CRIMBSVS, where he vnderstoode he should F meete with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting vp vpo a litle hil, from whence he might fe the campe of the enemies on the other fide: by chaunce, certen moyles fell apon his armie, loden

1. with finallage. The fouldiers tooke a conceyt at the first apon sight of it, and thought it was a Smallage in noken of ill lucke: bicause it is a maner we vie, to hange garlands of this erbe; about the tombes 14 fgme. of the dead . Hereof came the common prouerbe they vie to speake, when one lyeth a paf- Prounte, fing in his bed: he lacketh but finallage. Afmuch to fay, he is but a dead man. But Timeleon to draw them from this foolish superstition, & discorage they tooke, stayed the armie. And when he had vied certen perswassions vnto them, according to the time, his leysure, and occasion: he rold them that the garland of it felfe came to offer them victorie before hand. For, fayd he, the CORINTHIANS doe crowne them that winne the IST MIAN games (which are celebrated in as you have heard before: he first of all tooke of this smallage, and made him selfe a garland,& out it on his head. When they fawe that the Captaines and all the fouldiers also tooke of the fame, and made them selues the like. The sooth sayers in like maner at the very same time, per-ceivied two eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a fnake in her talents, which he pearced through and through, and the other as the flewe, gaue a terrible cry. So they flewed them both vnto the fouldiers, who did then all together with one voyce callypon the gods forhelpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of the formmer, and towards the later ende of Maye, the funne drawing towards the folltyce of the fommer: when there rose a great myst out of the river, that covered all the feilds over, so as they could not see the enemies campe, but onely heard a maruelous confuled noyle of mens voyces, as it had come from a great armie, and rifing up to the toppe of the hil, they layed their targets downe on the grownd totake a little breathe : and the funne having drawen and fucked vp all the moyft vapours of the myfte vnto the toppe of the hills, the ayer began to be fo thicke, that the toppes of the mountaynes were all concred oner with clowdes, and contrarily, the valley underneath was all cleare and their contrye) with garlands of smallage. And at that time also even in the solemne 13TMIAN Garlander of games, they vied the garland of smallage for reward and token of victorie: and at this present it is also vsed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp. that they have vsed braunches of pyne appletrees in the Istmian games. Now Timoleon had thus incoraged his men, fayer, that they might easily see the riner of CRIMES V s, and the enemies also, how they passed itouer in this fort. First, they had put their cartes of warre foremost, which were very hotly ar- Theorder of medand well appoynted. Next vnto them there followed tenne thowfand footemen, armed the Carthago with white targets vpon their armes: whom they feeing a farre of fo well appoynted, they coneftured by their stately marche and good order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS them selues. After them, divers other nations followed confusedly one with an other, and so they thronged ouer with great disorder. There Timoleon considering the river gave him oportunity totake them before they were halfe past ouer, and to servoon what number he would: after he hadshewed his men with his finger, how the battel of their enemies was deuided in two partes by meanes of the river, some of them being already passed ouer, & the other to passe: He commaunded Demaratus with his horsemen, to gene a charge on the voward, to keepe them from Timolon ge-putting them selues in order of battell. And him selfe comming downethe hill also with all his with charge footemen into the valley, he gaue to the Sicilians the two winges of his battell, mingling aponthe car-with them some straungers that served voder him: and placed with him selse in the middest, they came or E the Syracus an s, with all the choyce & best liked straungers. So he taried not long to joyne, My the timer when he saw the small good his horsemen did. For he perceyued they could not come to geue alusty charge apon the battell of the CARTHAGINIANS, bicause they were paled in with Thesenice of thefearmed carres, that ranne here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled the amen to wheele about continually, (onles they would have put them felues in daunger to have bene vtterly ouerthrowen) and in their returnes to geue venture of charge, by turnes on their enemies. Wherefore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out allowed to his footemen, to follow him coragiously, se to feare nothing. Those that heard his voyce, thought it more then Timoleons

But when they came to handle their fwordes, where agilitie was more requifite then force: a feareful tempest of thunder. & flashing lightning withall, came from the mountagnes. After that came darke thicke clowdes also (gathered together from the toppe of the hilles) and fell vppon the valley, where the battell was fought, with a maruelous extreame shower of rayne, fiercevin lentwindes, and hayle withall. did as much annoye the CARTHAGINIANS, bicaufe they were not nimble in their armor, him heauely armed as we have told you: and besides that also, when the playtes of their coars were through wett with water, they did lode and hinder them so muche the more, that they couldnot fight with any case. This stoode the GRECIANS to great purpose, to throwe them downe the easier. Thus when they were tombling in the durte with their heavy armor, yo they could rife no more. Furthermore, the river of CRIMESVS being rifen highe through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of people that passed ouerit, did ouerslowe theval ley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was straight all drowned ouer, and filled with many ronning streames, that ranne ouerthwart the feild, without any certen channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compassed all about with these waters. they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being ouercome with the florme that still did beate apon them, and the GRECIANS having slayne of their men at the first onfet to the number of foure hundred of their choycest men, who made the first fronte of their battell: all the rest of their armie turned their backes immediatly, and sled for life. Infomuch fome of them being followed very neare, were put to the fworde in the middeft of the valley: other, holding one another hard by the armes together, in the middeft of the river as they palfed ouer, were caried downe the streame and drowned, with the swiftnes and violence of the river. But the greatest number did thinke by footemanship to recover the hilles thereabour. who were ouertaken by them that were light armed, and put to the fworde enery man. They faye, that of tenne thow fande which were flayne in this battell, three thow fande of them were meete natural citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very forowfull and greenous loffe tothe city. For they were of the nobleft, the richeft, the lustieft, & valiantest men of all CARTHAGE For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former warres at any tyme before, wherether dyed so many of CARTHAGE at one feild and battell, as were flaynear that present tyme. For before that time, they did alwayes entertaine the FIBYANS, the SPANYARDS, and the No. MAD E S, in all their warres: fo as when they loft any battell, the loffe lighted not on them, but the straungers payed for it. The men of accompt also that were slayne, were easily knowenby their spoyles. For they that spoyled them, stoode not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, bicause they found gold and filuer enoughe. For the battell being wonne, the Gas-CIANS passed ouer the river, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their canages and bagage. And as for ptherifoners, the fouldiers stole many of them away, and set them going: but of them that came to short to make common division of the spoyle among them, they were about flue thow fand men, and two hundred cartes of warre that were taken befides. Oh, it was anoble fight to behold the tent of Timoleon their generall, how they enuyroned it all about with heapes of spoyles of every forte: amongest which there were a thowards braue corfelets guylt, and grauen, with maruelous curious workes, and brought thither with them also tenne thowsand targets. So the conquerours being but a small number, to take the froile of a multitude that were flaine they filled their puries even to the toppe. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battel, they fet vp a marke or token of their victorie. The Timoleon fent vnto Corint H, with the newes of this ouerthrow, the fairest armors that were gotten in the spoyle: bicause he would make his countrie & natiue citie spokenof & commeded through the world about al the other cities of GREBEE. For that at Co-RINTH only, their chief teples were fet forth & adorned, not with spoiles of the GREBCIANS. nor offerings gotten by spilling the blood of their ownenation & contrie: (which to fay truely. are unpleasant memories) but with the spoiles taken from the barbarous people their enemies. with inferriptions witnessing the valliancie & inflice of those also, who by victorie had obteined the. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS & their captaine Timoleon, (having delivered the GREECIANS dwelling in SICILE from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had geven those offerings vnto the gods, to geue thanks for their victory. That done, Timoleon leaving the ftraungers he had in pay, in the contrie subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, to spoile & destroy ithe retorned with the reft of his army vnto Syracvsa. Whereat his first coming home, he Timoleon bahanished the thow sand souldiers that had for saken him in his iorney, with expresse charge that thow sad ires they should departe the cittle before sunne sette. So these thowsand cowardly and murinous trous souldifouldiers passed ouer into I T A L I B, where, vnder promise of the countrie, they were al vnfortus errous of Sinately flayne by the BRVTIANS: fuch was the inflice of the goddes to paie their infle rewarde

Now the captaines of Timoleum bands fell out maruelously amongest them selues, striuing for honor of this seruice, which was cause of delaying the battel. For none would willingly come behind, but every man desired to lead the voward, for honor to begin the charge: so as they could not agree for their going one one thrusting another to get before his companion. Wherfore Timoleon fell to drawing of loss

The young Captaines seeing that, gaue a shoute of ioy, & without tarying drawing of other lottes, they began enery man to passe the river as quickly as they could, & to let apo the enemies as fodainely. But they being not able to abide their force, ranne their wayes, and were faine to cast their armor away to make more hast: howbeit there were a thowsand of them lay dead in the feilde. And within few daies after, Timoleon leading his armie to the citie of the LEONTINES, tooke leetes alive there, with his fonne Eupolemus, and the generall of his horsemen, who were deliuered into his hands by his owne fouldiers. So Icetes & his fonne were put to death, like the traitors & tyrannes: and fo was o

Euthydemus also, who though he was a valliant fouldier, had no better mercie shewed him, then the father & the sonne, bicause they did burden him with certaine iniurious words he spakesgainst the Corint Hians. Thus we see, that men do rather suffer hurt, then put vp injurious words: & do pardone theire nemies, though they reuenge by deds, bicause they can do no lesse. But as for injurious words they seme to proceed of a deadly hate, & of a cancred malice. Furthermore, whe Timoleon was returned agains to Syracvs a, the Syracvs ans arrained the wives of leetes, and his formen and their daughters: who being arrained, were also condemned to die by the judgement of the people. Of althe actes Timoleon did, this of al other (in my opinion) was the fowlest dede: for if he had lifted, he might have faued the poore wome from death. But he paffed not for them, & so left them to the wrath of the cittizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the injuries that were done to Dion, after he had driven out the tyranne Dionysius. For it was Icetes that caused Arete, the wife of Dion, to be cast into the sea, his fister Aristomache, and his sonne that was yeta

But feeing that the people cryed out, and made a great noyle, bicause they would not heare him, and that there was no likelyhoode they would pardone him: he ranne ouerthwart the THEATER, and knocked his head as hard as he could drive, vpon one of the degrees whereon they fate there to fee the foortes, thinking to hane dashed out his braynes, & haue rid him self sodainely out of his paine. And this his good loue & fauor, was common also to all other people of Sicile whatsoever. So that in all Sicile there was no truce taken in warres, nor lawes established, nor landes deutided, nor institucion of any policie or government thought good or avayleable, if Timoleons devise had not bene in it, as chiefe director of fuch matters: which gaue him a fingular grace to be acceptable to the goddes, and generally to be beloued of al me. Now, that he paciently tooke this miffortune to be blind altogether, peraduenture men may fomewhat maruel at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the Syrac vsans after he was blind, did so much honor him, & acknowledge the good he had done the, that they went them cufans did felues to visite him oft, and brought straungers (that were trauellers) to his house in the city, ing blind. & also in the contry, to make them see their benefactor, rejoycing and thinking the selues happy, that he had chofe to end his life with the, & that for this cause he had despised the glorious retorne that was prepared for him in GREECE, for the great & happy victories he had wone

A that they should ever choose a Corinthian for their generall, It was a goodly thing also to fee how they did honor him in the affemblies of their councell. For if any trifling matter fell in question among them, they dispatched it of them selves : but if it were a thing that required great counfaill and aduise, they caused Timoleon to be sent for . So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the affembly of the people was, and carved in even fo in his litter as he fate: and then the people dyd all falute him with one vovce, and he them in lyke case. THE COMPARISON

Ythe these two men were suche as the Historiographers have described A them to be : it is certayne, that comparing the one with the other, we shall fynde no great oddes nor difference betweene them . For fyrst of all, the warres they made, have been agaynst great and famous enemies: the oneagainst the Macedonians, and the other agaynst the CARTHAGINI-

ANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the realme of MACEDON, whiche he tooke from the seuenth kyng that raigned by succession from the father to the sonne, since the tyme of the great Antigonus and the other draue al the tyrannes out of Sicile, and restored the whole Ile & Cities therin, vnto their former libertie. Vnles some wil alledge perhappes that there was this difference betweene them, that AEmylius fought agaynst kyng Perseus, when he had all his powerwhole ! and entier, and had fought with the ROMANS many tymes before, and had the better of them in all conflictes: where Timoleon set uppon Dionysius, when he was in greatest dispayre, and in maner vtterly cast away. On the contrarie syde, it may be objected for Timoleon, that he outcame manie tyrannes, and a myghtie great armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, with aveile small number of men, and yet men of all fortes: not as AEmylius with a great armie of well trayned and expert fouldiers in warres, but with men gathered togeather at aduenture of all fortes, being mercenarie hierlings, and fighting men for paie, lose people, and men vnrulyin warres, that woulde doo but what they lifted. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we must confesse that the praise is due vnto the generall. Bothe the one and the other kept their handes cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke (vpon them. But it seemeth that AEmylius came so facioned and prepared, by the good civil lawe, and moral disciplyne of his countrie: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards facioned him felfe to be that he was. And this is to be proued for that al the Romains in that time were so civilly brought vp, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the lawer of their countrie. Where to the cotrarie, there was not one of the captaines of the GRECIANS that came then, or were sent into Sicilia, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foote in Sicile, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine suspicion of him, that he aspired to the kingdome, and imagined in his head to stablishe a certaine Empire at SIRA CVSA, like vnto that of LACEDAEMON. TI MAEVS the Historiographer writeth, that the SI-RACVSANS fent Gilippus with shame backe againe into his countrie, for his vnsaciable greedy D couetouines, and for his great theftes, and bribes taken in his charge. Divers other have also Writte the great treasons & falsehoddes Pharax Spartan, & Calippus A THENIAN did comit, both of them feeking to make them felues lordes of SIRACVS A: and yet what men were they, and what meanes had they to have suche a foolishe vaine hope & fancie in their heades? Confidering that the one dydfolowe and ferue Dionysius, after that he was driven out of SIRAC vsa: and the other also was but a private captaine of a bande of sootemen, of those that came in with Dion. Timoleon in contrary maner was fent, to be generall of the SIRACV SANS, vpon their great instance and sute. And he having no neede to seeke or hunte after it, but onely to keepe the power and authoritie they dyd willingly put into his handes: fo foone as he had defroved and overthrowen all fuche as woulde vniuftly vsurpe the government, he dyd immediately of his owne good wyll, franckly religne up his office and charge. And fure, so is this a notable thyng to be commended, and estemed in Paulus AEmylius: who having conquered so great and riche a realine, hencuer increased his goodes the value of one farthing, nether dyd fee nor handle any mony at all, although he was very liberall, and gaue largely vnto others. I The wooderful meane not in speaking this to vpbrayde or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted a fayre house continued the SIRACV SANS gaue him in the citie, and a goodly mannor also in the countrie: for in such from bribes. I cases there is no dishonesty in receiuing, but so is it greater honesty to refuse, then to take. But that vertue is most rare and singuler, where we see they will receive nor take nothing, though they have justly deserved it. And if it be so, that the body is stronger & better coposided, which mended best abideth chaunge of parching heate, and nipping cold: and that the mynde is much more ftronger and stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of prosperitie, nor drowpeth for sorowe in aductifitie. Then it appeareth, that AEmylius vertue was fo much more perfect, in that he shewed him selfe of no lesse graue and constant a mynde, in the pacience he endured for his losse 'Empline Constant a mynde, in the pacience he endured for his losse 'Empline Constant a mynde, in the pacience he endured for his losse 'Constant is far and forowe happened vnto him: (losyng at one tyme in manner, both his children) then he exceeded c had done before, in al his triumphe and greatest felicitie. VVhere Timoleon to the contrarye, Timoleons. having done a worthie act against his brother, could with no reasone suppresse the griefe and forowe he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentaunce, continued the space of twentie yeeres togeather, and neuer durst once only shewe his face againe in the market place, nor deale any more in matters of the common weale. Truely, for a man to beware to doo euil, and to shonne from euil, it is a verie good and comely thyng: fo alfo to be forie, and a fearde of euerye reproche, and ill opinion of the worlde, it sheweth a simplenesse of nature, and a good and well disposed minde, but no manly corage.

Ato the elder, aunswered certaine on a time, that maruelously commended a bolde, a venturous, and desperate man for the warres that there was great oddes, to esteeme manhodde so muche, and lyseso litle. And furely it was wifely spoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue paye to a fouldier among other, that was very hardie and venturous, but he had a noughtie fickly bodye. The king asked him one day, what he ayled to be so pale, and cuill cullered? The fouldier told him, he had a fecret difease vpon him, that he might not tell him with reverence. The king hearing him fay fo, commaunded his Phisitions and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they should heale him with all possible speede: and so they dyd. After the souldier had his health B againe, he would venter no more fo desperately in the warres, as he dyd before. Insomuch, king Antigonus selfe perceiuing his slacknes, and drawing backe, rebuked him, and said vnto The sumfrere him: that he wondred to fee so great a chaunge and alteration in him. The souldier neuer shrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainely. Your selfe, and it please your maiestie, is cause of my cowardlynes now, by healing my disease, that made my life lothsome to me. Much like were a SIBARITANS wordes, towching the life and manner of the LACED & MONIANS. That it was no maruaill they had fuch a defire to die in the warres, feeing they did it to ridde ons of life & them selves of their troubles, and most miserable and straight life. But we must not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womanish men, and altogeather genen to pleasure, didso good, and goodwill they had to doo their duetie. Which was contrarie in the LACED ARMO-

NIANS. For they were of opinion, that to line and die willingly, was a vertue: as these func-

And in deede to flye death, is no shame, so it proceede not of a cowardly hart mether to defiredeath is commendable, if it be with contempt and hate of life. This is the reason why Homer faith, the valliantest men are ever best armed, when they come to battaile. The lawe who the Greemakers among the GREECIANS, doo ever punishe him that castes away his target, but ne- cians do punerhim that casteth away his sworde or lawnce. For every man must first thinke to defende nith him that him selfe, before he seeke to hurt his enimie, and specially such as haue the whole state of a his target. realme in their handes, and be generalles of the feeld. For if the comparison be true, that Tobicrates the ATHENIAN Captaine made, that in an armie of men, the light horseme resem-whose liues depende vpon his saftie. As contrarily, he being carefull of his owne person, cannot but be carefull of his fouldiers that ferue vnder him . Therefore Callicratidas a LACED E-NON I AN captaine, and a woorthie man otherwife, did vnwifely aunswere a soothsaier that had him take hede to him felfe: for the fignes and tokens of the facrifices did threaten his minde. For he being redie to geue battell by sea, about the Ile of ANDRO'S, madea better C aunswer to one that said vnto him: his enemies had moe shippes then him selse. For how many (hippes does thou recken then my selfe, said he? Therein he did wisely to make great accompt of the worthines of a generall, specially when it is ioyned with hardines, and experience. For the chiefest poynte of seruice, is to saue him, that saueth all other. For when Chareson a time shewed the Athensans openly, the fundrie woundes and cuttes he had recei-

D him selfe in daunger: then he should put him selfe forwarde, and occupie both handes and body without respect, not regarding their wordes that say, a good wife captaine shoulde die for age, or at the least old. But where there is small honor to be woone by very good successe, and contrariewise muche losse and distruction by great missortune: no man of wisedome or iudgement would wish a generall, to fight as a private souldier, to hazard the losse of a generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the lines of Pelopidas, and of Mar-contrie stoode in greatest neede of suche men and captaines, as they were. This is the cause, THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought up in great wealth, his father lefthim heire È being geuen to ouermuche pleasures. So riche men became slaues all their life time, some to pleasure, other to profit . Now, al Pelopidas other frendes woulde be beholding to him, and take very thanckfully his curtefie and liberalitie towardes them. But Epaminondas could neuer ble the handes, the men of armes the feete, the battaill of footementhe stomake & brest, Iphicante the captaine, the head of a mans body: it feemeth then, that the venturous captaine putting an armit of him selfe in daunger with out cause, is not onely careles of his owne life, but also of all theirs men.

It is true, that to fight by sea or by land man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of him selfe: but as captaine or lieuetenaunt ge- of an amie nerall, he had the whole power and force of the armie in his person. ed to see a darte throwne from the walles, light hard by me, for that I shewed my selfe a rashe young man, and more venturous then became a generall of fo great an armie. For when it ftandeth much apon the whole armie, and that it is necessarie the generall thereof doo put cellus, both which were woorthie men, and died otherwise then they shoulde. For they both were valliant fouldiers in the fielde, and did both of them honor their contrie with famous Pelopidas & victories, and specially against great and dreadfull enemies . For the one was the first (as they Marcellum faie) that ouerthrewe Hanniball, who was neuer ouercome by any before. And the other lines by to E also ouercame the LACEDEMONIANS in battell, that ruled al GREECE at that time both by much venue fea and by land. Yet they both carelesly lost their lines, by venturing to boldely: when their ring.

why we following the refemblaunce that was between them, have compared their lives to- Pelopida gether . Pelopidas, the sonne of Hippoclus, came of one of the noblest houses of the citie of fock & libeof all his landes and goodes, being but a young man. So he straight shewed him selfe willing to doo good with his monie, to those that needed helpe, and were worthie to let the worlde ing of rick fee, that his monie was not his maister. For as Aristotle saith, of these rich men, the most part men, of them do not vie their goods, for extreame couetouines: other againe doo abuse them, as

be brought to any thing at his handes . Howbeit Pelopidas felfe followed Epaminondas maner. A for he tooke a pride and pleasure to goe simply appareled, to fare meanely, to labor willingly and to make warres openly as he did. He was even fuch another, as Euripides the Poet defend bed Capaness to be: when he said of him:

He rich and vvelthie vvas yet vvas he therevvithall, no veight that purchast vevorldly hate nor insolent at all.

For he would have been ashamed, that the poorest man of the cittie of THEBES, shoulde have worne meaner apparell apon his backe, then him felfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouertie was not daintie to him, bicause his parentes were euer poore: and yet for all that he paffed it ouer more eafely, by studie of Philosophie, which he gaue him selfevnto, and for that from his youth he liked to leade a spare life without excesse. Where Pelopidas matched B in a noble house, and maryed highly, and had two children by his wife: neuerthelesse he had no minde to keepe or increase his goodes the more for that, but gaue him selfe altogeather to ferue the common weale as long as he lived. By reason whereof his wealth decaied, and his best frendes grewe angrie with him, telling him how he did not well to make no more recks. ning of a thing that was fo necessarie, as to have goodes. And he auniwered them: In dede they are necessarie, I doo confesseit, but yet for suche a one, as this poore, lame, and blynd man that standeth by . They both were a like borne to all vertue, saving that Pelopidas tooke most pleasure in exercise of his body and strength, and Epaminondas in the exercise of his wit and learning. So as the pastyme eche of them tooke when they were at leasure, was that the one delighted to wrastle, and to hunte, and liked any kinde of exercise of his body: and C the other to heare, to studie, and alwaies to learne something of Philosophie. But among all the excellent giftes and good partes in either of them, and that most wanne them honor and estimation in the world, they were onely commended, and singularly noted of wife men, for the perfect love and frendshippe that was ever inuvolably kept between them, vntil their deathes: having been joyned togeather in fo many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwise in matters of state and gouernment. For if a man will consider, and looke into the doinges of Ariftides, Themistocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicias, and Alcibiades, howfull of diffentions, enuies, & fuspicions they were one against another in gouerning the common weale: and againe will confider the loue, honour, and kindnesse, that continued alwaies betwext Pelopidas and Epaminondas: no doubt they will faie these two are more worthie to be D called brethren in warre, (as they faie) and companions in gouernment, then any of them we haue named before, whose care and studie was alwaies rather to ouercome one another then to ouercome their enemies, and the onely cause thereof was their vertue. For their actes shewed they did not seeke glorie, nor riches for them selues (the couetousnes whereof doth allwaies breede quarrelles and enuy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in love with an other, with a great kindenes and estimation of them selues, to see their contries to rishe, and growe to great honor through their seruice, and in their time: and so they reckoned all the good exploytes both of the one and the other, that tended to that ende, as their owne. The most part of writers thinke, this great and earnest loue thone did beare to another, did growe first betwene them, in a iorney they made togeather vnto MANTINIA, to F. ayde the LACED EMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both fet in battell raye, one hard by another among the footmen, against the Arcadians that stoode before them: it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACED E-MONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determining to die rather then to flye, stoode close together, and fought with the enemies that came apon them: vntyll fuch time as Pelopidas being hurt in feuen places before, fell downe at the last vpon a heape of dead bodies, aswell of their owne fouldiers, as of their enemies, euen one apon an other. Then Epaminondas thinking he had ben flaine, stept notwithstanding before him to defend his body & armor, & he alone fought against many, being willing to die rather then to forfake Pelopidas lying amongest the dead bodies: vntyl him selle ; being thrust into the brest with a pyke, and sore cut on his arme with a swoorde, was even ready to gene ouer, when Agesipolis (king of the LACED & MONIANS,) came with the other frendshippe betwixt Pelo-

A poynt of the battell in happie howre, who faued both their lives past all hope. Now after this harrell, the LACED & MONIAN'S both in wordes and deedes did curteoully intreate the THE-BANS, as their frendes, and confederates. Notwithstanding, in troth they beganne to feare the power and great corage of that cittie, and specially the faction and associates Ismenias 82 Androclidas had fet vp, whereof Pelopidas also was a copanion : bicause they thought it was -populer, and inclined muche to defire libertie . VV hereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, al three great welthie men of the cittie of THEBES, and milliking to be equall with other cittizens:did perswade Phabidas, a captaine of the LACED & MONIANS, that going and comming through the contrieof B OR OTIA with an armie, he would one day affaie to take the castell of THEBES called CADMEA, and driving those out of the cittie that would resist him, he would B nutthe gouernment of the state into the hands of a sewe of the noblest persones, who would best alone by heat the deuotion of the LACED & MONIANS, & obey them in all thinges. Phabidas brought Phabidas it to passe, and did worcke his feate before the THEB ANS mistrusted any thing, apon a holy the Laceden day called THE SMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the castell, he apprehended Ismenias, and monianu. fent him to LACED & MON, where shortly after they put him to death. Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Imenios Androclidas, with many other, faued them selues by slying, and were banished THEBES by founde of Trompet. Epaminondas taried still in THEBES, and no man tutched him, for they made small accompt of him, bicause he was altogether geuen to his booke: and though his goodwill had ferued him to have done some feate, his povertie made him vnable to doo any Pelopidas. thing. The LACEDEMONIANS understanding of the taking of the castel, did straight put Pherenicus thing. The LACEDAMONIANS vinderitaining of the taking of the childs out of his charge, and feta fine of a hundred thow fand DRACHMES apon his head: clidar, banishbut yet they kept still the castell of CADMBA in their handes with a great garrison. All the edfrom Theother citties and people of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they should allowe the fact, bea and punishe notwithstanding the doer. So the THEBANS having lost their auncient libertie, and being made subject by both these, Archias, and Leontidas, so as all hope was taken from them euer to winde out of this tyrannie, or at any time to ouerthrowe it, seing it was maintained and defended by the LACED & MONIANS, and that they could not possibly take from them all the seigniorie and dominion they had throughout GREECE, as well by sea as by lande: Leontidas and his followers notwithstanding, when they understoode that they who Leontidas,gowere banished fro Thebes, were very wel received & entertained of the people at Athens, werens of and much made of also of the nobilitie, they sought secretly by treason to have them kylled. Thebes, and the made of also of the nobilitie, they sought secretly by treason to have them kylled. To do this feate, they fent certaine men vnknowen vnto ATHENS, who by treason flue An-monians. droelidas, howbeit they missed the kylling of the other. Furthermore, the LACEDE MONI-ANS Wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they should not receive suche as were banished from Androciidan THERES, nor that they shouldefauor them, but drive them out of their cittie, as thosewhich by their allyes were Iustly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS notwithstanding, being men alwaies civilly geuen, and inclined in nature to humanitie, as being borne and bred vp withall, and very defyrous besides to requite the Theban's curtefy, who had bene the chiefest meanes and doers in restoring agains the populer state and government The thankat ATHENS: they would by no meanes offer the THEBANS any fuch injurie, feing they had fulnes of the flablished a lawe and decree, that if any ATHENIAN passing to and fro through the contrie of the through the BOROT 1 A, did beare armor against the thirtietyrannes, that were gouernors and oppressors of Thebana the libertie of ATHENS, there should no BOBOTIAN seeme to see, or knowe any thing therof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger fort, did procure still every one that was banished, to seeke the libertie of his contrie, and openly made an oration to them the libertie of all, declaring, that it were not onely a cowardly part, but also a wicked offencero the goddes, the Thebana if they would fuffer their contrie to remaine foin cotinual bondage, & straungers to inhabite it with a garrison, to make them subject to the yoke: and they in the meane time to be conteted to faue the felues, to live delicately and idely at ATHEN s, to studie to doe what shal please the ATHENIANS to commaund the, & to be affraide of the orators, & those which through F. eloquence can perswade the common people to doo what they lust. Therefore he perswaded them that they (hould hazard all, being a matter of fo great weight, and take example of

When he had by these perswasions drawen them to his oni nion, they fecretely fent vnto their frendes that remayned still in Thebe s, to let them vnder. fland their minde and determination; who all lyked very well of their purpose. Infomuche. CHARON that was the chiefest man among them, promised to lende them his house to ak femble in . Philidas also founde meanes to be secretarie to Philip and Archias, who were go. uerners & captaines of the city at that time for the LACED & MONIANS. Epaminondas on tho. ther fide making no shewe of any thing, had of longe time practised to styrre vp the corageof the youngemen of THEBES. For when they were at any games or exercises of bodye, he woulde euer procure them to wrastle with the LACED EMONIANS. And after he sawe them rejoyce when they had cast them, and that they were the stronger: he would chide them b & tell them they might be ashamed, for lacke of corage, to suffer the L ACED EMONIANS to hold their nofes to the gryndstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the conconfirmete a. federates appointed a day certen, to breake the ife of their pretended enterprise, & agreed that gainst the La- Pherenicus, with other that were banished, shoulde tarie at the village of THRIASIVM, and for the libertie that they should sende the valliauntest and lustest young men before, to gene the venter to enter the cittie: adding this therewithall, that if the enemies fortuned to surprise them, all the other of the conspiracie joyntly togeather, should be ready to gene order, that their fathers, mothers, and children, should lacke nothing necessarie for them. Pelopidas was the first man offered him selfe to vndertake the enterprise: & after him Melon, Damoclidas, & Theopompu, all three, men of the greatest houses of Thebes, who loued maruelously togeather, and for no C respect would ever offend one another, although from the beginning there was ever emulation among them for honor & glory, by striuing who should exceede other in vertue & valliantnes. Now they were twelve of them, who taking leave of the rest, sent a foote post before to Charon, to advertise him of their comming : and they them selues went on their iorney cast. ing litle thort clokes apon them, and taking houndes with them, and hunters staues in their handes, bicause their enterprise should not be mistrusted by those that met them on the way, and that they should thinke them hunters vp and downe the feildes for their pleasure. So, whe their messenger they sent came to the cittie, and had tolde Charon that they were comming he neuer shronke from his worde, though the daunger towarde was great, but like a stowt and honest man did abide by his promise he made, and tolde him they should be most hartely wel. I com to his house. But another man called Hipposthenidas, very honest otherwise, & one thatloued his contry and the preservation thereof, and a good frend of those also that were banished fainting straight apon the sodaine report of these newes, and his minde was troubled, and his hart fayled him fo, as his note fell a bleeding, to thinke apon the greatnes of the instant damger he was like to fal into, having neuer cast before with him selfe, how by this enterprise they Thoulde put all the empire of the LACED & MONIANS in hazard of vtter destruction, and laye a plat befides to ouerthrowe all their owne common weale and state, by laying al their hope apon a fewe banished men, hardly able to wade through with their enterprise. Whereupon, to fone as he was come home, he fecretly dispatched a messenger, one of his familiar frends, vnto Melon & Pelopidas, to will them they should deferre their enterprise for better oportunit tie. & fo to returne backe again to A THENS. Chlidon was the man helent of this mellage, who prefently went home to his house: and taking his horse out of the stable, bad his wife setche him the brydell quickly. The brydell not being readily to be founde, the told him the had lest it out to one of their neighbours. Then they fell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to fowle wordes, and lastely his wife fell a curfing of him, and prayed the goddeshe might have ill lucke in his iorney, and those that sent him . Chlidon having spent the most part of the day, chiding and brawling with his wife about the brydell, and furthermore milliang the tokens of his wives curling and banning of him: he determined not to goe a foote outer the dores of that arrant, and fo went about some other busines. Thus had this noblectness prise in manner bene altogeather dashed, before it was fully begonne. Now those that were in Pelopidas companie, chaunged apparell with the contrie men, bicause they would cloynes appa not be knowen, and did deuide them selves, for that they would not come into the cittle

A together, but at divers gates, beinge day light. At that time it was a meruelous winde and great fnowe, and the weather was so boysterous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the conspirators, that they were not knowen when they came into the cittie. So their frendes and confederates within the citie receased them as they came, and brought them to Charons house: where were assembled together, with those that were banished, eight and forty persones only. Now for the tyrans, thus stoode the matter with them. Philidas their secretary was of the conspiracy, as we have told you before, and he knewe all the practife. Wherefore he creater to the had longe before solemnely bidden Archias and his companie, to supper to his house that verie man. night, to be mery together, & had promifed to entertaine them with women to welcome them with all: of purpose, that when they had in their full cuppes, and were in the middest of all their pleasure, the conspirators might then vie them as they woulde. So they beinge sette at table before they were sped of their cuppes, one came to them, and told them truely of the treason (not the particularities, neither as a thinge certaine, but of a rumor onely that ranne abroade in the towne) howe the banished men were hidden in Charons house. Philidas woulde haue passed the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would nedes sende one of his garde straight for Charon, to commaunde him to come to him presently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company pre- Pelopidas pared themselues to worke their seate, being armed every man, and their swords in their hands. damger. when apon a fodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the house runninge straight to the gate, came backe againe afearde to tell them that it was one of Archias garde that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernours. Then were they in doubt that their practife

C was discouered, & that they were all cast away, before they coulde make any proofe of their valliantnes:notwithstanding, they were all of opinion, that Charon should obey the message, & that he should present himselfe before the gouernors, to take away all suspition from them, Charon of him selse was a stout man, very constant, & resolute in daunger for his owne persone; yet it greued him much at that time, for feare the confederates shoulde suspect him he hadde bewrayed the if fo many honest citizens whom he had lent his house vnto, should vnfortunately miscarie. Therefore before he went out of his house, he went into his wives chamber to fetch his sonne. that was a goodly boy, but strong as any boy of his age could be: so he brought him to Pelopidas, and prayed him, if hevnderstoode that he had betrayed them any way, or otherwise had sought their hurt, they shoulde then vse his sonne as an enemie, without any compassion towardes him. D When the cofederates faw the good zeale & true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weping. and were angrie with him, that he should thinke any of them so faint harted, or timerous for any daunger coulde come to them, that they shoulde suspect or accuse him for any thinge : and therewith all they prayed him, not to leave the boye with them, but rather to convey him into some place out of the tyrans daunger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong & injurie they had done to them, and to their contrie. Charon auniwered them, he woulde not take him away, & that he faw no life nor health more happy for him, then to dye with his father without infamy, and with fo many honest men his frends. So after he had

befought the goddes to prosper them, and hadde encouraged and embraced euerie one of the confederators one after an other. He went to the gouernors, and studied by the way lo to frame E his wordes and countenance, as though he shoulde seeme to thinke of any thinge else, then of that he purposed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feast, Archias and Philidas him selfe came vnto him, and asked him: Charon, what are they (fayd they) that are come into the city, and hidden in some house, with certaine citizens that do accompany them? Charon was fomewhat abashed at the first, and asked them againe: what men bethey? who are they that hides them in the citie? But when he perceived that Archias coulde tell nothinge of certaintie, then he thought straight that some man hadde informed them that was not privile to the practife, but hadde hearde some thinge of it. Thereupon he willed them to take heede it was no false alarome, to make them afrayed: neuerthelesse (faydhe) I will enquire surther of its for at all aduenture it is good to be circumspect in such a case to be sure, Philidas aunswered him,

F he faid truely and fo he brought Archia backe againe into the hall where he made him drinke deeper then before, still entertaining the company with hope of the womens comming. Charon returning home againe, found all the cofederats ready to attept their enterprise, not as men that reckened of their lines, nor that had any hope to prenaile: but as those that were determined in dve valliantly, and to fell their liues dearly. Now he truely tolde vnto Pelopidas onely, what was faid vnto him & the rest:he told that Archias had sent for him to speake with him, of other mar. ters. The storme of the former daunger was scant blowen ouer, but fortune sent them an other For immediatly uppon talke had with Charen at the first, came a messenger from ATHENS, that brought a letter to the same Archias, written by the Bishop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias also as him selfe, & was his old hoste & frende: wherein he wrote not of simple conjecture nor furmised suspition, but the plaine conspiracy in euery degree, as afterwards it fellout. So the reasons Ar- messenger was brought to Archias that was dronke, and deliueringe him the letter, he said vom him. Sir, he that sendethyou this letter, straightly charged me to telyou, that you should present ly read the contents thereof, because it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing fayd vnto him:waighty matters to morow. So he tooke the letter and put it vp, & then fell againe to his tale he had begonne with Philidas. But euerafter, the GRECIANS made this a common prouerbe among them: waighty matters to morrow. Now when the cospirators spied their time to go about their businesse, they deuided them selves in two companies. Pelopidas and Damoelidas went with one company, to fette vpon Leontidas and Hypates, because they dwelt nere together: Charon and Melon with the rest, went against Archias and Philip, beinge disguised in wo. mens apparell they had put vpon their priny cotes, & wearing garlands of pyne apple and fone trees on their heads, that couered all their faces. So when they came to shew them selues at the hall dore where the bancket was made, they that were in the hall at the first fight, thinking they had beene the women they looked for , beganne to showte, and made great noyse for ioye. But C when the conspirators cast their eyes rounde about the hall to knowe those which were at the table, they drew out their fwordes, and fet uppon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they shewed them selues what they were. Then Phidias bad his guestes he hadde bidden to the bancket with them, that they shoulde not stirre, for they shoulde have no hurt: so some of them fate still. But the greatest nomber of them woulde needes from the borde, to defende their gouernours. Howebeit bicause they were so dronke that they knewe not what they did, they were soone slaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterprise was not so easie. For they went against Leons das, that was a fober discrete man, and withall, hardy of his handes: and they found he was gone to bed, his dores were thut vp, and they knocked long before any man came to the dore. At the length, one of his men that hearde them rappe so hard, with much a do came to open the dore in but he had no sooner thrust backe the bolt of the dore, and beganne to open it, but they pushed it from them with fuch a force apon him altogether, that they layed him on the grounde, and went straight to his maisters chamber. Leontidas hearinge the noyse of them that ranne vppeto him in such hast, presently mistrusted the matter and leaping out of his bed, tooke his sworde in his hande, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chamber all night, for if they hadde beene out, they might eafily have hurt one an other in the darke. But the lampes givinge cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber dore, and gaue Cephifodorus, the first man that preffed to enter apon him, such a blowe with his sword, that he dropped downe dead at his feete. Hauinge slaine the first man, he dealt with the seconde that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard between them two, bothe for that the chamber dore was verie g straight, as also for that Cephisodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the comming in at the chamber. Notwithstandinge, Pelopidas ouercame him in the ende, and slue him: and went from thence with his companie, straight to Hypates house, where they got in, as they did into Leon tidas house before. But Hypates knewe presently what it was, and thought to faue him selfein his neighbours houses. Howbeit the conspirators followed him so harde, that they cutte him of before he coulde recouer their houses. Then they gathered together, and joyned with Melons company, and fent immediatly with all possible speede to ATHENS, to the banished THEBANS there, & cried through the city, liberty, liberty, arming those citizens that came to them, with the armor & spoyles of their enemies, that were hanged up in common vawtes, & armorers shops about Charons house, which they brake open, or caused to be opened by force. On the other F fide, Epaminondas, and Goreidas, came to ioyne with them, with a company of young men & honest olde men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon, the whole citie

A was straight in an viprore & tumult, & euery house was full of lights, one running to an other to know what the matter was. Neuertheles the people did not yet affemble together, but euery one being amazed, musing at this stur, not vnderstäding the troth, staied vntill day came on, that they might call a counsell. But truely herein, me thinkes the Captaines of the garrison of the L ACE-DEMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not sturre betimes, & set woon the incontinently: consideringe they were xv. hundred souldiers, besides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after an other to take their partes. But the great noyle they heard, made them afeard & to fee lights in every mans house, & the people running vp & down the streets in great multitudes to & fro: wherupon they stirred not, but only kept the within the castel of CADMEA. The next morninge by breake of day, came the other banished THEBANS from ATHENS VERY welarmed, & al the people of THEBES drew together in counfail. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas, & his coforts, & presented the before the people, copassed about with priests & the professed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, & they praied the assembly of the citizens, that they would help their gods, & their contrie. Al the people that were present, whe they saw them, rose vp, & stoode on their feete, & with great showtes & clapping of hands received the, as their fauiours, that had delivered their contry fro bondage, & reflored them again to liberty: & therupon, before them al, euen in the market place, by the whole voice & confent of the people, they choic Pelopidas, Melon, & Charon, gouernors & captaines of all BOE OT IA. Pelopidas then immediatly made them befrege the castell of CAD ME A about, with rrenches, & force of wod, doing al he could possible to winne it, & to expulse the LACEDEMO- Pelopidari-HERICIPS, COLOR OF THE STATE AND THE STATE AND THE STATE AND STATE CEDEMONIA, they found Cleombrotus king of SPARTA in the contry of MEGARA, comming to- position.

wards the with a great army to help the. Afterward, of the three captaines which had charge of their garrison that lay at THEBES, the SPARTANS condened two of them to death: Hermippidas, & Arciffus, were presently executed: & the third captaine, Dyfaoridas, they set so greenous a fyne on his head, that he wet out of PELOPONES VS. This enterprise being attented, & executed with the like valiantnes, & the fame dauger & trouble, that Thrasybulus practise was, whe he deliucted ATHENS from the flauery of the thirty gouernors & tyrans, & having the like fortune, & happy ende: the GRECIANS termed it cofyn german to Thrafybulus act. And in deede it were a harde D matter to find two other fuch, besides the two, that with so few me ouercame their enemies, being many moe in nober then the selues, or that with so small help did ouercome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprise with their only valiantnes & wisedo, & were cause besides of so great bleffing & benefit to their contry, as Pelopidas & Thras bulus attept was. But the great chauge & alteracion of the state afterwards, did make their actes farre more noble & famous, For the warre that ouerthrew the maiestie of Spart A, & that tooke away all the seigniorie & rule of the LACED EMONIANS bothe by fea & by land, beganne the very fame night, feigniorie of when Pelopidas him felf making the twelut person, & entring into a private house, (taking nether the Lacedscitie, nor castel, nor stronge hold) to tel truly by figurative speach, did breake & cut in sonder the linkes & chaynes that lincked straight together, & stregthened the LACED & MONIANS whole empire & monarchie ouer al GRECE: who vitil that presettime were thought so strong, as no possibilitie could breake or sonder them. Now the LACED EMONIANS fortuning afterwards to inuade the cotry of BOBOTIA with a mighty army: the ATHENIANS trebling for feare of their great power, did ytterly leaue to protect the, & renownced the league & alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did straightly prosecute law against those, that were accused to take part with the BOBOTIAN s: wherof some of the were put to death, other were banished from ATHENS, & the rest condened in great summes of money. To be short, every man fayd the THEBANS were but vndone, confidering they had no help, & were beloued besides of none. At that preset time it fel out Pelopidas & Gorgidas were generals ouer al B OBO TIA for that to make the square, they vsed this policie. There was a captaine of the LAGED & MONIANS cal- licy to make led Sphodrias, a valliat ma, but else of final capacity, & vainly giue, having a certe fond ambitio & the Athenians humor, perswading him selfe he had done some notable good service in his time. This Sphodrias fall one against was left in the city of THESPIES, with a great band of fouldiers, to recease & fauor al the Bos o- cedemoniance

(a very frende of his) vnto Sphodrias, with a great some of money from him; and certaine perfers fions withall, which prevailed more then the money, withinge him to attempt fome greater matter, & to feke to winne the hauen of PIRAEA: a thing foone wonne, if he came to affault it on the sodaine, & the rather, for that the Athenians mistruste nothinge, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might affure himselfe, nothinge coulde be better welcome to the lords of LACED & MONIA, the to make them lords of the city of ATHENS also. And againe the the Thebans, being at deadly foode with the Athenians, for that they had betraied & forfale them in their nede, would not aide nor fuccor the in any respect. Sphodrias giving to light earem this vaine perswassion, tooke the souldiers he had with him, and marching away by night, entred the realme of ATTICA, & wet on to the city of ELEVSIN: but whe he came thither, his fouldier ? were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpose beinge discouered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, having raifed fuch a warre to the LACED EMONIANS, as fel out to beofm small importance to them, nor easie to be pacified. For after that time, the Athenians sough league & amity againe with the THEBANS, & did aide them very louingly: & moreouer, putting them selues to sea, they failed vp & downe, procuring & drawing to their league all such, as were willing to rebell against the LACED & MONIAN SISE the THEBAN'S besides, had many prety skir. mishes with the LACED & MONIANS in the meane time, in their own cotry of BOE OTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was such a great learning & cotinual training of themin marshall discipline, as the THEBANS still increased in corage & valliantnes, & waxed stronger &

As we read, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN faid one day to king Azesilaus, cominge home fore hurt fro Bob ot 1 A: furely the THEBANS have given your worthy reward, for teaching the to be fould iours against their wils. The victory of the Thebans against

DEMONIANS were ouerthrowe in fundry iorneis, that they were diffressed by the cities of Pie

TEES,& of THES PIES, where Phabidas himselfe (that had before taken the castell of CADMEA) was flaine amongst other. An other great power of theirs also was ouerthrowen nere to the city of TANAGRA, where Panthoidas gouernor of the fame, was also slaine. Now all these victories. though they much encoraged the hearts of the conquerors, & made the hardy yet did they not therby altogether coquer the mindes of the vanquished. For the LACEDE MONIANS were not ouercome in any pitched field, nor fet battel, where they had their whole army together butther were light rodes, & skirmishes properly laid of purpofe, where fortime flying; somtime driving Pelopidas vi- the againe, they bickered very oft, & put the to the worft. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a florish & profeto the journey of LEVCT RE s, wan Pelopidas great honor. For he had no co-F And at the base panió to chalege any part of his glory & victory, neither did he leave his enemies any lawfules. raile of Togy- cuse, to shadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he spied al occasio he might possible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACED & MONIANS, and had received two enfignes of footemen of theirs to kepe it. Pelopidas being aduertifed one day, that the garrifonof ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the contrey of the LOCRIDES, hoping he shuld finde O R CHO MENE without garrison:he marched thither with his holy band, & certains nüber of horseme. But whe he drew neere the city, he had intelligece there was another garrison coming fro Sparta, to supply the place of the garrison that was abroad wherupo he returned backe againe by the city of TEGYRA, for he could have passed no other way, but to have turned down by the foote of the montaine. For al the valley that lay between both, was drowned with the ouerflowing of the river of M BLAS, which eve fro his very hed carieth ever fuch bredth withit, as it maketh the marishes nauigable, so as it is vnpassable for any shallow it hath. Not far fro these marishes, stadeth the teple of Apollo TEGYRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left of at

A this day, & had never long continuance, but only vntill the time of the warres of the Ma Das when Echearates was maister and chiefe priest there. And some holde opinion that Apollowas home there: for they cal the next mountaine to it, D a r o startlie foote wherof the marithes of the river of META'S doo end, and behinde the temple are two goodly fpringes, from whence commeth great aboundance of good weete water: whereof the one of them is called to brought to this day the Palme, and the other the Olive. And some say also, that the goddesse Latons was bed between not brought to bed between two trees, but between thele two springes. For mowners on the state of the springer is hard by it also, from whence the wildebore came on a sodaine that flighted her . And the Palme and tale that is tolde of the serpent Pytho, and of the gyaunt Tityus, doo both confirme it that the Uline. Apollo was borne in the fame place. I passe ouer manie other conjectures confirming the fame, for that we doo not believe in oure contrie that spolle is among the nomber of thole; who from mortall menne haue bene translated to immortall goddes, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put of mortalitie, and tooke immotrality apon them: but we rather take him for one of thidle that neuer had beginninge nor generation, at the least if those thinges be to be credited, which so many grave and auncient writers have left in writing to vs, touching fo great and holy things. The THEBANS TOTUTING backefrom ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDEMONIANS on the other fide returning also from LOCRIDE, both at one time, they fortuned both armies to mete about the citty of Tingy RA. Now, fo fone as the THEBANS had discourred the LACEDEMONIANS passing the straite. one of them ranne fodainely to Pelopidas, and tolde him: Sir, we are fallen into the handes of the LACED & MONIAN'S. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, anniwered Relovidus againe? with these wordes, he commaunded his horsemen that were in the rerewards to come before, and fett apon them: and him felfe in the meane time put his footemen immediately into a pretie foundron close togeather, being in all, notaboue three hundred men. hoping when he should come to gene charge with his battell, he should make a lane through theenemies, though they were the greater nomber. For the LACEDEMONIANS demided them selves in two companies, and every company as Ephores writeth, had five hundred ment and as Calliftenes fayed, feuen hundred. Rolybine , and divers other authors faye, they were

nvne hundred men. So., Theopompus and Gorgolson, the Captaynes of the LACEDEMO-NIANS luftely marched agaynft the THE BAMS: and it fellour to that the first charge was geuen, where the chiefetaynes or generalles were of either fide, with great furie on eyther Pelopidas parte, fo as both the generalls of the LACED EMONIANS which fettyppon Pelopidate toge- victorie. ther, were flayne: They being flayne, and all that were about them, being either hurtor killedinthe fielde: the rest of the armie were so amased , that they denided in two , and made a laneon either side, for the THEBANS to passe through them if they would. But when they saw Pelovidas mene not to take the paffage they offered him, and that he came on ftill with his men to set apon those that were yet in battelraye, and slue all them that stoode before him: then they turned tayle, and tooke them to their legges. How beit the THEBANS did not chafe them farre, fearing the Or CHOMENIANS who were not farrefrom them, and the new garrison besides. that were come from LACED A MON not long before. And this was the cause they were contented that they had our comed them by force, and had passed through their armie in despite of them, and broken and ouerthrowen them. Sowhen he had fetyp markes of triumphe, and fpoyled their flayne enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obteyned vi-Cone. For in all the warres the LACED & MONIANS ever made, aswell with the GRECIANS, as with the barbarous people also, there was neuer chronicle mencioned at any tryme a that their enemies being fo fewe, did ouercome them that were fo many, nor that they were ouercome also by any number equall in battell. Whereuppon they grewe so coragious and terrible, that no man durst once abyde them: for their onely fame did so terrifie their enemies that came to fight against them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe as muche as they had done. But this battell of TEGYRA was the first that made both them and the other GREECIANS knows, thatit was not the ryuer of EVROTAS alone, nor the valley that lyeth betweene the squers of CNACION, and of BABY CB, that breedeth the valuant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places elfe, where they learne young what enemies men to be ashamed of dishonest and vyle thinges, and to venter their lives for honest causes a are most in-fearing more dishonorable reproche, then honorable daunger. These are the people most in be feared, & are most terrible also to their enemies. And for the holy bad we mecioned before The first infli- it is faide, Gorgidas was the first erector of the same. They were three hundred chosen men entertained by the state, and they alwaies kept within the castell of CADMEA, and the bande was called the townes bande : for at that time, and specially in that part of GREECE they called the castels and great holdes in citties, the townes. Other say it was a bandon fooremen that were in loue one with another. And therefore Pammenes pleafaunt words are noted, faiying, that Neftor coulde no skyll to fet an armie in battell raye, feeing he gaue the GREE CIANS counfell, in the ILIADES of HOMER, that they should set them in battel rave euery countrie and tribe by them felues: That by affections force, and lynkes of kyndly loue:

that one might alwaife helpe at hande that other to behove For, saide he, one frende should rather be set by another that loues togeather: bicausein daunger, men commonly do litle regarde their contrie men, or suche as are of their tribe. But men that doo loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the paffion of love that entertaineth eche others affection, for affection sake, dothe kepe them from forsaking one another. And those that are beloued, being ashamed to doo any vyle or dishonest thing before those that love them, for very love will sticke one by another to the death. And sure the reason is good, if it be true that louers doo in deede more regard them they love though they be absent: then other that be present. As appeareth by the example of hym,0 that being striken downe to the ground, his enemie lifting vp his swoorde to kyll him, he praied him he woulde geue him his deathes wounde before, lest his frende that loued him, seeing Hereales & a wounde on his backe, shoulde be ashamed of him. It is reported also, that lolaus being be-Iolaus lone.

loued of Hercules, did helpe and accompanie him in all his labors and quarrels, Whereupon Aristotle writeth, that vnto his time, such as loued hartily togeather, became sworne brethren one to another, apon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this bande was first called the holy bande, by the selfe same reason that Plato calleth a louer, a diuine frendely goddes appointment. It is written also, that this bande was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowen. before the battel of CHAERONEA: After that battel, Philip taking vewe of the flaine bodies he stayed in that place where the fourehundred men of that bande laye all dead on the grounde, h one harde by another, and all of them flayne and thrust through with pikes on their breftes. whereat he wondred muche: and being tolde him that it was the louers bande, he fel a weeping for pittie, faying. Wo be to them that thinke these men did, or suffered any envilor dishonest thing. And to be short, the missortune of Lains, that was slaine by his owne brother Oedipus, was not the first originall cause of this custome, that the THEBANS beganne to be in loue one with an other as the Poars write: but they were their first law makers, who perceiuing them to be a stout & sierce natio of nature, they sought euen fro their youthe to make them gentell and civill, and therefore in all their actions both of sport and earnest, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, beinge highly estemed of them in those dayes. They brought in the vse also to make love, in the middest of all their youtheful g The Goddesse sportes & exercises of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring themto a ciuil lyfe. And therfore they had reaso that gaue the goddesse HARMONIA to the THEBANS, for defender and patronesse of their cittie, who was begotten (as they say) between Mars and Venus. For that geneth vs to understande, that where force and warlike corage is joyned with grace, to winne and perswade: all thinges by this vnion and accorde are brought, to a goodly, proffitable, and most perfect gouernment . Now, to return e againe to the matter of this holy bande of the THEBANS. Gorgidas deuiding it in the former ranckes, and placing it all alongest the fronte of the battell of the footemen, it did not appeare what they were able to doo of them selues, for that he brought them not all into one body: so as thereby they might see what seruice the whole companie coulde doo, being togeather, considering that it was f deuided and mingled amongest manie other, that were a great deale of lesse value then them schues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valliauntnes before, when they fought about him of them selves, without others by them, at TEGYRA: woulde never after devide nor seperat them one fro the other, but keeping them together as one entier body that had al hismembers, he would alwaies beginne with them to geue a charge, in his most danneerous hattels. For, as we fee in running of coches at games, that horses being tyed all together in afronte, doo runne faster and stronger, then they doo when they are lose, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many togeather doo breake through the aver better, but for that the contention and enuy betweene them to outronne one another doth indede fet their hartes and stomakes a fyre. Euen so he thought, that valliaunt men geuing one another a defire and enuie to doo well, shoulde have the more corage, and woulde be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers fight. But the LACEDEMONIANS afterwardes being at peace and league with all the other GRHECIANS, proclaymed open warres against the THEBANS onely: and kyng Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an army of tenne Cleombrotus thowsande footemen, and a thowsande horsemen. Wherupon, the THEBANS were not only king of the in the like daunger they stoode in before to lose their libertie, but the LACED EMONIANS did openly threaten they would veterly destroy them for ever; so that all the contrie of B of o-

TIA stoode in greater feare, then ever they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his house to goe to the warres, his wife bringing him out of the doores to takeher leave of him, weeping, the praied him hartely to looke well to him felfe. But he aunswered her Pelopidas againe my good wife, it is for private fouldiers to be carefull of them felues, but not for capraines, for they must have an eye to saue others lives. And when he came to the campe, he founde the captaines and the Lieuetenantes of the armie, in fundrie opinions; and he was armie, but onely captaine of the holy bande: notwithstanding they had great affiance in him. & gaue him great authoritie in coulaile concerning their affaiers : fuch as became a man that hadmade fo good testimonie of his natural love & affection to his contrie, as he had done. Now, being determined in counfaile that they should geue the enemie battell, they all mustred together in the valley of LEVCTRES, where he had a vision in his dreame, that troubled him verie muche. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Stedafus, whiche by reason of the place, they call the LEVCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defyled and rauished, by certaine guestes of the SPAR-TANS that laye in their house, trauayling that way. This act being so horrible and wicked, the poore father of these defiled virgines, coulde neither haue justice, nor reuenge of the

For they were men so trained, that they could turne head or fide upon any fodaine occasion offered, and coulde fight and order them selves in battell every way alike. So Epaminondas going to geve thonfet apon them alone, with the whole force of his battaile togeather, not tarrying for others; and Pelopidas also with an incredible corage and readines, prefenting him felfe in battell before them, did put them into fuch a terrible feare, that they cleane forgotte their skill in fightinge, and their wonted courage fayled them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and their were moe LACEDARMORI-A resslaine that day then euer were before in any former battell. honor and great reputacion of these two persones, Epaminondas and Felopidas, brought their thousand mi. frendes and confederates, that they followed them, without any refolution of counfell or publike order, and neuer opened their mouthes against them, but willingly marched under their conduction. And in my opinion, truely me thinkes it is the first and chiefest point in the lawe of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himselfe, should leane to one that is strong, and able to defende bothe. Euen much like to freshe water souldiers, and rawe sea men, that lying at fea in calme weather, & in fafe harber, are as lufty & bragge with the mafters & botefwaines as may be: and let a little ftorme of weather come apon them fodainely, and that they bein any daunger, then they looke on the masters, hoping for no life but at their handes. And euen in like maner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all affemblies of counsel they woulde ever iarre and strive with the Thebans, for honor and superioritie in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherin they faw there was daunger, then their pecockes brauerie was gone, and they were glad to obey their generalles commaundement. In this iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to be in league with them, and tooke all the contrie of MESSENIA from the LACED AEMONIANS, which they peaceably enioved : and called home againe all the auncient inhabitantes of the fame, and restored them to their contrie, and replenished the citie of ITHOMB: Then returninge afterwardes into their contrie by the citie of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entringe into the straight of PELOPONNESVS, supposinge to have stopped their passage. Thus was the valliantnes of these two worthy men greatly commended and honored of euery body, for fo many notable exployts & victories as they had wonne, and The inequality their maruelous good successe greatly wondered at. But as their glory and renowne increased inde of the abroade, so did their contrie mens malice and enuie encrease against them at home: who had Thebans, soprepared fuch a welcome home for them, as was to bad and vile for so honorable service as day and Epathey had done. matters of state hotooke in hande. But he coulde neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he fought to make bate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all spitefull persones, when they can not be thought so honest men as those whome they enuie: to go about to proue that they are not so honelt and meete men, as those whome R they preferre and commende. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble actes and victories, and specially that victory about o ther, which the THEBANS wanne before the iorney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmith of horsemen, that was before the city of PLATERS, he havinge charge of the same: of the which he woulde leaue this memory. Androcydes a CYZICENIAN and painter, was at a price with the THEBANE to painte them some other battell in a table, and he did drawe this worke in the citie selfeof Thebes:but as he was in hand with all, the rebellion of the Thebans fell out against the La-CEDAEMONIANS, and warre followed on the necke of that, whereuppon the painter for fooke THEBES, leavinge his worke in manner done and perfitte. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they woulde hange it vp in some temple or pu. C blicke place with an inscription aponit, sayinge thus. This was Charons victorie, of purpose to deface and obscure the glorie of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. To vaine and fond was his ambition, to set before so many noble battells and victories, one simple ouerthrowe of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meanest gentlemen of all Sparta was slayne, and forty other with him: & this was all he did. Pelopidas misliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly against the lawes of THEBES, which did expresly forbid that no private person should be honored with the title of common victorie, but willed the glory thereof should be attributed to all the peoplegenerally. In dede Pelopidas in all his orations did greatly praise and commend Charon, notwithstandinge, he made open proofe, howe Meneclidas was an enuious and fpitefull detractor, and a naughty wicked man, oftentimes askinge the THEBANS; if they them D felues were worthy of no honor? fo as in the end he caused Meneclidas to be condemned in great fumme of money. But he finding him felfe vnable to pay it, beinge fo great a fumme:practifed afterwardes to alter the whole state and gouernment. I thought good to dilate this at large, bicause me thinkes it doth somewhat declare Pelopidas nature, and maners, what they were. Now about that time, Alexander, the tyran of Phenes, was at open warres with many people of THESSALIE, and did vse all policie he coulde, to bringe them all to his obedience, Whereupon the free cities sent their Ambassadors vnto Thebes, to pray them to send them a captaine, with an armie to aide them. Then Pelopidas seeinge Epaminondas occupied about the warres of Peloponnesus, did offer himselse to the Thessalian Ambassadors, beinge lothe to drowne his experience and fufficiency in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idlenes, knowing that in those partes where Epaminondas lay, there neded no other captaine. Now when he came with his armie into Thessalie the citie of Larissa yelded presently vnto him: where the tyran Alexander came to mete with him, and to pray him to treate a peacebetwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attempted to bring it to passe, seeking in steade of a tyran, to make him a gentle, just, and lawefull gouernor of THESSALIE. But when he saw no perswasions could take place with the tyran, and that he grewe more stubborne and vntractable, and woulde not heare reason: and moreouer that he heard many greuous complaintes of his great cruelties, and how they accused him to be a maruelous dissolute and vnruly perfon in all his doinges, and extreamely couctous besides: then he beganne to speake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyran thereupon stole away secretely from him, and F fled with his gard and fouldiers about him. So Pelopidas leauninge the The SSALIANS out of all feare and daunger of the tyran, and furthermore in good peace and amity one with the oA ther, he went into MACED ON; where Ptolomy made warre at that time with Alexander, beinge kinge of MACEDON, they bothe having fent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, and also to helpe him that had the right, against him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them bothe, and restored the banished men of either side, to their landes and goodes againe. For affurance of the peace, he tooke the kinges brother in o- Philip of stage, whose name was Philip, and thirtie other children of the noblest mens sonnes of MACE- Macedon, denon, whom he brought away with him to Thebes, to let the Greecians fee, that the reputacion of the THEBANS power stretched farre, & the renowne also of their manner of gouern. Pelopidae. ment and inflice. It is the same Philip, that made warre afterwardes with the GREECIANS, to taketheir libertie fro them:howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THE-

BES in Pammenes house. And this is the cause, why some thought Philip did followe Epamimondas manner: and it might be paraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which in deede was but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as to the continency, inflice, magnanimitie, and clemencie, which were the speciall pointes that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip coulde neither by nature, education, nor studie euer attaine vnto. The THE SSALIANS havinge fent afterwardes to THE BES, to complaine of Alexander the tyran of PHERES, that did againe molest and trouble the free cities of THESSALIE: Pelopidas was sene thither Ambassador with Ismenias, carying no power with him fro THEBES, little thinking he shoulde have needed to have made warres: whereupon he was compelled to take men of the contrie selfe, vppon the instant necessitie offered. At the very same time also, all MACBDON C was vp in armes. For Ptolomy had flaine the king, and vfurped the kingdom, and the feruaunts and frendes of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for aide: who defitting to come even vppon the fact, and having brought no men of warre out of his owne contrie with him, did prefently leauie certaine men where he was, and so marched forward with them against Ptolomy. Nowe Ptolomy when bothe their powers met, did corrupt the fouldiers Pelopidas had brought with money to take his parte. But notwithstandinge this policy he had practifed, yet he was afeard of the name onely, and greatnes of Pelopidas reputation: wherefore he went ynto Pelopidas as to a better man than him felfe, and making maruelous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promife, and bounde it by othe, that he would keepe the realme for the brethren of the dead king, and that he woulde take all those for his frendes or enemies, whom the THERANS n did either loue or hate. And for affurance of his promise, he gaue him his sonne Philoxenus in oftage, and fifty other of his frendes, all the which Pelopidas fent vnto THEBES. But in the meane time, beinge marueloufly offended with the treason of the fouldiers against him, vnderstandinge that the most parte of their goodes, their wives and children, were in the citie of PHARSALE, he thought if he coulde winne that, it were a maruelous good way for him to be reuenged of the trechery of the fouldiers against him:whereupon he leauied certaine Trus-SALIANS, & went to that citie. Pelopidas was no fooner come thither, but Alexander the tyran arrived also with his armie. Pelopidas supposing he had come to instifie him felse, clearing the complaintes of the THESSALIANS made against him: went to him, though he knew him to be avery wicked man, and one that delited in murder and sheading of blood. Neuertheles, he ho-E ped he durst not have attempted any thing against him, for the authority and seigniories sake of THEBES, by whom he was fent thither, as also for his owne reputation. But the tyran feeing him flenderly accompanied, and without traine of fouldiers: tooke him priloner, and wanne the city of PHARSALE at that present time. But this act of his put his subjects in a great feare, ken prisonner who seeing him commit so shamefull a deede against all equity, did thinke straight he ment to by the prant fpareno man, but would vie men, and all thinges elle that came in his handes, like a desperate Alexander of Phosphia. man, & one that reckned him felf call away. But when the THEBANS vinderstoode this newes, they were maruelous forie, and fraight fent an army thither appointing other Captaines then Epaminondas, bicaufe then they had some misliking of him. Alexander the tyran having brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PHERES, did fuffer any man that woulde, at the first to come and see him, and speake with him: supposinge his imprisonment had killed his hart, and had made him very humble. But when he was tolde the contrary, how Pelopidas did comforte Pelopidas the citizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good cheare, tellinge them the howerwas fountee now come that the tyran should smarte for all the mischiefes he had done and that he sent him a word to his face, he had no reason to hang and put his poore citizens daily to death as he did with fundry kindes of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him, & did let him alone. knowinge that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. Pelopidas beinge tolde what he sayd, aunswered him againe Mary, fayd he, bicause thow shouldest dye the sooner, beinge more odious to the goddes and men, then yet thou art. After this answere, the tyran would neuer suffer any man to come and speake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyran lason deceased, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyran, hearinge reporte of Pelopidas noble minde and corage by his keepers : she hadde a meruelous desire to see him, and to speake with him. But when the came to fee him, like a woman the could not at the first different the greamesse of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, findinge him in fuch mifery; yet conjecturinge by exterior show, notinge his simple apparell, his heares and beard growen very long, & how poorely he was serued, and worse entertained: she thought with her selfe his case was to be pittied. and that he was in no state mete for the glory of his name, wherewith she fell a weepinge for compassion. Pelopidas that knewe not what she was, beganne to muse at the first: but when it was tolde him the was Iasons daughter, then he curteously faluted her for her father Iasons fake, who while he lived was his very good frend. And his fortune was fo good, that he had in a manner veterly ouerthrowen all the whole state of the tyran:his frends and captaines were fo much afraid, and his fubicates on the other fide fo well disposed to rebell, and maruelous glad for the hope they had, quickely to see the tyran have his defet ued hyer, for all his former wicked deedes he had committed. Notwithstanding, Epaminonda preferring the deliuerie and lafety of Pelopidas, before the confideration of his owne honor glorie, and fearinge least Alexander seeinge him selfe in daunger to be turned out of all he had, falling in despayre like a bedlem beast, woulde bende all his desperation and fury against Pelopidas: he drew these warres out in length, compassinge him rounde about, but not fierces ly fetting apon him, with culler to prepare his way the better by delaying still, therby to soften E the cruell minde of this tyran, goinge on in this gentle force, and partely to cutte his combe and extreme pride, but specially to preserve Pelopidas, from the daunger and crueltie of his beaftly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruel man, and one that neither regarded reason, nor iustice in any forte, consideringe howe he made some man to be buried aliue, and others truelty of A- to be put in the skinnes of beares and wilde bores, and then to fet houndes apon them to teat them in peeces, or elfe him felfe for his pastime would kill them, with shootinge or throwinge of dartes at them. And in the cities of MELIEAA and of Scotvsa, bothe of them beingem league and frendshippe with him, he spying a time one day when the citizens were assembled in counfaill together, fodainely compafied them in with his gard and fouldiers, and put them euery one to the fivord, euen to the litle children. And he colecrated the darte allo whereith R

he had flaine his owne vncle Polyphron, and having put garlandes apon it, he did facrifice to it, as to a god, and called it TY CHON, as one woulde fay, happy killer. And an other time being

A in a Theater, where the tragedy of Troades of Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and fent word to the players notwithstandinge, that they shoulde go on with their playe. as if he had bene still amonge them: faying, that he came not away for any misliking he had of them or of the play, but bicause he was alhamed his people shoulde see him weepe, to see the miseries of Hecuba and Andromacha played, and that they neuer saw him pity the death of any one man, of fo many of his citizens as he had caused to beslaine. The gilty conscience therefore of this cruell and heathen tyran, did make him tremble at the only name and reputacion of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe fayth:

So he sent straight vnto Epaminondas to excuse him selfe. But Epaminondas woulde in no wife fuffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make league with fuch an hell hounde: only he velded to abstinece of armes for thirty daies, apon delivery of Pelopidas & Ilmenias into his handes, with whom he straight returned vnto THEBES. Now the THEBENS being advertised Ecominondas that the LACED EMONIANS & the ATHENIANS did sende Ambassadors to Artaxerxes the delivered mighty king of Per siasto make league with him: they fent to him Pelopidas for them also being wifely confidered of them to fende a man of such tame and reputacion. But when he had feene his face, and heard him speake, and perceived that his wordes were much graver then the ATHENIANS, and plainer then the LACED & MONIANS: he then was further in love with him then before, and without difguifing he did honor and fauor him aboue all the other Ambassadors, who found that he made more estimacion of him, then of the all. Notwithstanding, he feemed to beare greater good will vnto Antalcidas LACED EMONIANathen to any other of the Greecians: for that one day beinge at the table, he tooke a garlande of flowers from his E owne head, and washed it in perfuming water, and sent it vnto him. Yet it seemeth the gifts he tooke did not offende the ATHENIANS fo much, confidering that Epierates (a drudge or tanckerd bearer) did not onely confesse before the people, howe he had taken giftes of the king of PERSIA: but fayd furthermore, that he would have a law made, that as they did verely choose nine officers to rule the whole city: so that they would choose nine of the poorest and meanest citizens, and sende them Ambassadors vnto the king of Parsia, that they might returne home rich men with his giftes. The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they demanded:not confidering that Pelosi-R das estimacion and worthinesse did more preuaile, and take better essect, then all the orations the other could make, and specially to a Prince that sought alwaies to enterteine those GR A-CIANS, which were of greatest force and power in the warres. This Ambassade did greatly increase every mans love and good will vnto Pelopidas, bicause of the replenishinge agains of MESSINA with inhabitants, & the infranchefing & fetting at liberty of all the other GREECI-ANS. But the tyran Alexander of PHERES, returning agains to his old accustomed cruelty, and having destroied many cities of Thessalle, & placed his garrisons through al the contry of the PHTHIOTES, ACHAIANS, and MAGNESIANS: the cities being advertised of pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they fent Ambassadors immediatly to THEBES, to pray the to sende the an army, & namely Pelopidas for Captaine, to deliuer the fro the miserable bondage of the C Pelopidus fe- tyran. The THEBANS willingly graunted them, & put all things in readines very fodainely. But Pelopidas being ready to fet forward in his iorney, there fel a fodain eclipfe of the funne, fo as at tyran Mexa. none daies it was very darke in Thebes. Pelopidas feing euery man afraid of this eclipseabone. he would not compell the people to depart with this feare, nor with fo ill hope to hazard the losse of seven thowsande Thebans, being all billed to go this iorney but notwithstanding he The eclipse of put him selfe alone into the THESSALIANS handes, with three hundred horsemen of straungers, that were glad to ferue with him, with whom he tooke his iorney against the foothfayers mindes, and against the good will of all his citizens, who thought this eclipse did threaten the death of some great persone like him selfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no spurre to bereuenged apon the tyran Alexander, being by nature hotte, and defirous of him felfe to revenge n the spite and villany he had offred him yet he had a further hope to finde the tyrans house deuided against himselfe, by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his imprisonment there. Neuertheles, the fame and reputacion of the iorney vndertaken, did wonderfully increase his noble corage, and the rather, bicause he was desirous (all he coulde) the GREECE ANS should see, that at the very same time when the LACED EMONIANS did sende gouernors & captaines to Dionysius, the tyran of Sicile, to serue & aidehim, & that the Athenians as hyerlings tooke pay of the tyran Alexander of PHERES, in whose honor they had set vp a statue of braffe in their city, as vnto their fauior: the Thebans only at the felfe fame time tooke armes against the, to deliuer those whom the tyrans oppressed, & sought to roote out altyrannical gouernment ouer the GREECIANS. So, when he came to the city of PHARSALE, & had E gathered his army together, he went presently into the field to mete with the tyran. Alexander, perceauing Pelopidas had very fewe THEBANS about him, and that he had twife as many moe THESSALIANS with him, then the other had:he went to the temple of THETIS, to mete with Banall genen Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was comminge against him with a great be the remple power. Pelopidas answered him straight, al the better, we shalk il the more. Now, in the middest of the valley, there are certaine round hils of a good prety height, which they commonly call the dogges heads: they both striued which of their footemen should first get those hils. Pelopidis having a great number of horsemen, & good men at armes in the fielde, sent them before to give charge apon the enemies, that preased to winne the vantage of the place: & having ouerthrowen them, they followed the chase all the valley ouer. But in the meane time, Alexan-F der hauing his footeme hard by, marched forwards, & got the hils, bicause the THESSALIANS that were further of came to late:notwithstandinge, when they came to the hilles, they sought

But Alexander comming downe the hil. gaue charge apon them to their disaduantage, & slue the first that gaue the attempt to get vo against the hil: and the residue beinge sore hurt, retyred againe without their purpose. Pelopidas seeing that, sounded the retreate for the horsemen that followed the chase, to repayre to the standard, and commaunded them they should set apon the sootemen of the enemies that were in battell raye; and him felfe ranne to helpe those that fought to winne the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and passing through the rereward, got to the formest ranckes: to whome, the fight of his persone did so redouble their force and corage, that the enemies them selves thought it hadde beene a freshe supply of newe mens hartes and other bodies. then theirs with whom they hadde fought before, that came thus lustely to fette againe apon them. And yet they did abide two or three onfettes. Howebeit in the ende, perceiping those men did still more fiercely force to gette vp the hill, and moreouer how their horsemen were come in from the chase: they gave way, and left them the place, retyring backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas havinge wonne the hilles, stayed on the top of them, viewinge the army of his enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waved vp and downe in great disorder. And there he looked all about, to see if he coulde spye out Alexander : and at the length he founde him out amongest others, in the right winge of his battell, settinge his men againe in order, and incoraging of them. After he had fet eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his hart fo rose against him apon sight of him, that geninge place to wrath, he neither regarded his persone, nor the intent of his iorney, but runninge farre before his men, he cried with a lowde voyce to the tyran, and chalenged the combat of him. The tyran woulde notabide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid him felfe amongest his fouldiers. But for his fouldiers, the first that thought to fet apon Pelopidas, were slaine by him, and many left dead in the fielde. The refidue standing stowtly to it, and close together, did passe his curaces through with their long pykes, and thrust him into the brest. The THESSALIANS seeinge him thus fore handled and diffressed, for pities sake came runninge from the toppe of those hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to helpe him. But even as they came, he fell downe Pelopidas deade before them. Then did they together with their horsemen so fiercely sette apon them. Saine.

But as Pelopidas death was greuous to the THEBANS frends & confederats: fo fell it out very profitable for them. For the THEBANS hearinge of Pelopidas death, did not delay reuenge, but fent an army E

Malcitas, and of Diogiton. They findinge Alexanders army overthrowen, & that he had loft the most parte of his strength, did compel him to geue vp the THES SALIANS townes he keptby force against the & to set the Magnesians, the Phthiotes, & the Achaians at liberty,

But if it please you to let vs handle his body with our handes, and that we may bu-", ry him, and fet forth his obsequies: we will imagine then at the least that you doe thinke that " which we our felues do certainly beleue: that we The s salians, not you The Bans, have re-" ceiued the greatest losse of both. For you haue lost in deede a worthy Captaine, and we have " not only receased that like loffe with you, but the hope also of recoveringe of our liberty. uory, nor of purple. As Philistus doth fet it out, who praifeth to the moone the buryinge of Dionylius the tyran of Syracy sa, which was the ende of his tyranny, as a fumptuous conclus fion of a stately tragedy. And Alexander the great, at the death of Ephestion, did not only clippe his horse heares & mules, but plucked downe also the battellments of the wals of the city bicause it shoulde appeare, that the very walles them selues did mourne for his death, shewinge great, for the that deformitie, in steede of their former beawtie. But all such thinges are done only by force and compulsion, apon the Lordes commaundementes, which doe but raise vp enuy against their memorie for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are against their willes conftrained to do the thing they misliked: & are no instraonfes of honor nor good will, but rather C vaine showes of barbarous pompe, and pride in him, that disposeth his authority and plenty of goodes, in trifling toyes not to be defired. So Alexander was the first tyran that was ever slaine by the treason of his wife, whose body was most villanously & dispitefully vsed after his death. Areus Claudius that was five times Confullat Rome, was the some A (as they fay) of an other Marcus: and as Polidonius wryteth, he was the first of his house surnamed Marcellus, as who would say, a marshall & warlike man by nature. For he was cunninge at weapons, skilfull in warres, stronge and lusty of body, hardy, and naturally genen to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor shewed his great corage, but in warres against the enemy:otherwise he was euer gentle, and fayer condicioand med. He loued learning, and delited in the Greeke tongue, and much esteemed them that could speake it. For, he him selfe was so troubled in matters of state, that he could not study and follow it, as he defired to have done. For if God (as Homer fayth)did euer make men

Capitolinus at the first, layed in many exceptions and fained excutes, to kene him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainely they would not receive his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. Arthe length he was forced to auniwere the matter before the Senate, and denied flarly that heattempted euer any fuch thinge, bicause there were no witnesses to proue it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to fende for young Marcellus, who comminge before them, bothe blushed, and wept together. For before, they neuer vied any straunge maner in their facrifice, or barbarous facion, but were fauorable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religion, & agreeable to the GREECIANS, touching the service of the goddes. But then, they were compelled to obey certaine oracles, and auncient prophecies they found wrytten in Si-BYLLES bookes: & they buried two GREECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man & a woman, Men and woand likewife two GAVLES, a man and a woman. The Conful Plaminius receased the letters in time

For they thought it more necessary and profitable for benefit of the common weale, that the Senate and magistrates should reverence the ceremonies and service of the goddes: then that they should ouercome their enemies in battell. As for example Tiberius Sempronius, a man as much honored and esteemed of the Romaines for his instice and valle antnes, as any other of his time: beinge one yeare Conful, did nominate & elect two other for Consuls the yeare following, Scipio Nasica, & Caius Martius. These two being entred into their Confulship, and sent from ROME also to their severall provinces appointed them by lots sempronius by chaunce tooke certen litle bookes in his hande, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonies of publike facrifice, and reading in them, he found a certains ordinaunce he neuer heard before. And this it was. That if a magistrate were set in any tentor far publike far hyred house without the citie, to beholde and observe the prognostications of birdes, & that vpon any sodaine occasion he were driue to come againe into the citie, before the birdes had giuen any certaine signes: the second time when he returned againe to ende his observations I there was no remedy, but he must leave his tent or first hyred house, and take an other, and beginne new observations againe. Tiberius vtterly ignoraunt of this ordinaunce before, had kept his observations twife in one selfe house, and had chosen there, Nasica and Martins, Consults to succeede him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it who wouldnot let flippe so litle a fault:but wrote to the newe Consulls, and they straight left their prouinces, and returned againe to Rome, willingly refigninge up their offices. That was a prety whileaf ter. Againe also, about the very present time we write of nowe, there were two Priestes of noble houses (and noble persones also) the one called Cornelius, and the other Cethegus, boths which were disgraded of their Priesthoode, bicause they had not given the intrayles of thesacrificed beaft in order, as they should have done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was disgraded of his Bishopricke, bicause his miter which the FLAMINES doe weare, fell of his head in his facrificing. Minutius being Dictator also, and havinge chosen Caius Flaminius generall of the horesemen: bicause they heard the noyse of a ratte at the electio of Flaminius, they were boths put out of their authoritie, and other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise euen in trisles, it was not by reason of any supersticion mingled with their religion: but bicause they woulde not breake any iotte of the auncient institucions and ceremonies of their contrie. But to our storie againe. Flaminius beinge depriued of his Consullshippe, Marcellus was created Confull in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges, Marcellus being Cnew Corne- inuested in his office, chose Cnew Cornelius for his companion: and they say, that the GAVLES lius Confulli. beinge inclined to peace, and the Senate of Rome also willinge to harken to peace, Marcellus F did stirre vp the people, and made them rather desire warre. Notwithstandinge, they concluded peace at that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the wars again.

A Forthere came ouer the mountaines of the ALPES, a thirty thowfand of them, & they joyned The Genter with the INSVERIANS, which were many moe in number then the felues, Now, they being in Geffater make amaruelous iolity, went incontinently to lay fiege to the city of ACBRRBS, that standeth apon Rome, and the river of Po: and during the fiege, king Britomarus taking ten thowfande GESSATES with come out the him, went & destroyed all the contrie about the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left with his compattion Cneus Cornelius, al the armed footemen, & the third parte of the horseme, in his campe symposities by ACERRES: & he him felfe with the refidue of the horseme, & fix hundred footeme light ar- river of Po. med,marched towards the enemy, trauelling night & day, vntil he met with the ten thowfand

So he had no leasure to take rest, nor to village or. refresh his men a little: for the barbarous people knew straight he was come, & tooke him for this side the no better then by and by ouercome, bicause he had so fewe footemen. And for his horsemen, mountaines. the GAVLES made no reckening of them: for befides themselves are very good men at armes. and excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of horsemen farre about Marcellus.

Therefore they straight marched towardes him in a maruelous furie, and with thunderinge showtes as if they would have denowred them at their comminge. Britomarus their king, aduaunced him selfe before all his company. Marcellus fearing to be compassed in behinde, being fo finall a number: he put out the winges of his horiemen as much as he could to have the contrie at large, so that his two wings were very slender, vntill he came nere his enemies. And being ready to gallop towardes the enemie, it fortuned his horse beinge afraid with the noyse of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus backe againe in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES supersticion, in taking this for an euill token, and that they woulde take a conceite apon the same: plucking the bridle with his left hande, turned his horse head againe vppon the enemie, and then he worshipped the sunne, as though he had not turned his horse by chaunce, but purposely for that cause. For it is the ROMAINES manner to turne about so, The maner of when they do honor their goddes. So when they beganne to joyne battell, he made a vowe to the Romaines Impiter Feretrian, to offer him vppe the goodlieft spoyles of his enemies, if he did ouercome. when they worthing, Thekinge of the GAVLES feeinge him at that instant, imagined by the markes and tokens he faw, that he should be the general of his enemies: So he set spurres to his horse, and gallopped The comban towardes him from all his company gening him defiance, & chalenged him, shaking his staffe horsebacke D inhis hande. He was the goodlieft persone and strongest man of all the GAVLES, and his ar- betwief Brimor was all guilt and filuered, and so fet foorth with fundry workes and colours, that it shined of the Gaules, as the funne. Marcellus on the other fide havinge viewed all the army of his enemies through and Marcelout, and perceauinge none fo richely armed as the king: thought straight it was against him, luc. that he had made his prayer and vowe to Iupiter. Then he put his horse in full cariere against him, and came with fuch a force & fury to him, that he pearced his armor with his staffe, and ouerthrew him, but yet he killed him not dead wherupon he fodainly redoubled two or three fine king Britrokes besides apon him, and so slew him right out. Then he lighted from his horse, & taking sometimes of the state of the the dead kinges armor in his hande, he lift up his eyes to heauen, and faid. O lupiter Feretrian, Marcellur thou that doest from heaven beholde and direct, all marshall feates and Captaines deedes: thy prayer was felfe I call to witnes, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being generall of the army, witness haue flaine with my owne handes, the king and generall of the enemies; and I promife here to thee, to offer thee vp the richest spoyles of mine enemies, so thy godheade will vowchesafe to graunt vs the like good fortune in all this warre besides. His prayer ended, the men of armes of the Romaines ranne in among the horsemen & footemen of the Gavles, one being vn-

a straunge and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer seene before nor since, that so fewe horsemen did ouerthrow, so great a number of men of armes and sootemen ran- The Gaules ged together. Now when Marcellus hadde flaine the greater number of them, and had gotten Marcellus.

Then, when all the show of his triumphe was past, he him selfe tooke the oke on his shoulders, and gotte vp vpon his trium. phing charet, and so marched through the city, carying these signes thereupon: which was the noblest fight, and honorablest show, of the whole triumphe. His army followed after the charet, finging verses and songes of victory, in praise of the goddes and their Captaine; and when he had paffed through the whole city, and was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrian. there he fet up this young oke, and token of triumphe. This Marcellus is the third and last Ro-MAINE Captaine, to whom happened this honor in our age. For the first man that euer office (vp to Iupiter the spoyles of the general of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wanne the like Spoyles of Acronking of the CENINIANS. The second was Cornelius Cossus, who slue Tolumning, generall of the THVS CANS. And the third was Marcellus, who flue with his owne handes Britomarus, king of the GAVLE s: and after him, no man euer fince could obtain the like good fortune. The god to whom these maner of spoyles are consecrated thus, is called Jupiter Feretrian, so tearmed as some write, bicause they do cary this token of triumphe to him, following the derivation of this Greeke word. Ferin, which fignifieth to cary; for in those former times. many Greeke words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirme it is one of the furnames of Iupiter, fignifying as much as lightening: for Ferire in the Latine tonge, fignifieth to strike. And fome fay also, in warres it is properly to hurt or kill with his owne handes: for the ROMAINES D do vse at this day when they geue a charge apon their enemies in battell, or that they have them in chase flying, to crie, incoraging one another, Feri, Feri; which is as much, as kill, kill, And the spoyles taken fro the enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieutenantes generall or generalles do take from the generalles of their enemies when they have flaine them, they are called particularly Spolia opima. Yet some hold opinion, that kinge Nums what they be. Pompilius mencioning the rich spoyles or Spolia opima in his comentaries, speaketh of the first, the fecond, and the third: and commaundeth that the first spoyles which are wonne, should be confecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the second vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus, And that they should give to him that had wonne the first spoyles, three hundred Asses: the second, two hundred: & the third a hudred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion & vsuall taking of Spolia ! opima, referreth them to be the first spoyles wonne in a foughten field, & those which the Lieutenat of an army, or a general, doth take fro the general of the enemies, after he hath flainchim with his owne handes. And thus much for declaracion of this matter. Furthermore, the Ro-MAINES were so ioyfull of this victory, & of their good successe in this warre, that they caused a massie cuppe of golde to be made of the spoyle they had gotten, weyinge a hundred pounde weight, which they fent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias: in the city of DELPHES, in token of thankes: and they made liberall division besides of the spoyles vnto their frendes and confederates, and fent a great parte of it vnto Hieron king of Syrac vsa, who was their confederate. Not log after, Hanniball being entred ITALIE, Marcellus was fent with an army by fea, into Sicile. these famous victories, the Senate of Rome gaue all the honor of triumphe vnto Marcelland the infinite spoyles, and the numbers of great mentaken prisoners, and also for the exceeding fumptuousnes & stately shew thereof. But the goodliest fight of all for the rarenes, was to behold Marcellus (elfe, carving on his shoulders the whole spoyle of the barbarous king to offer)

A the ROMAINES youth, and their greatest force, woulde not fayle to come straight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus first sent fifteene hundred of his men by sea, to help to defende Rome: and havinge afterwardes receased commaundement from the Senate, he came to CANNYsive, where he tooke such as were fled thither for succor after the battell, & so brought them out to the fielde, to defende the contrie. Now the ROMAINES having loft the most parte of all their best Captaines, in diverse sundry battells before: of all those that remained, Fabius Maximu was the onely able and reputed man for commendacion of his honesty and wisedom, yet they milliked of him notwithstanding, for a timerous man, and of no corage, as a man to ful of doubts and confideracion, and loth to put any thing in hazard: faying, he was a good Captaine to defende, but not to offende the enemy. Whereupon they thought good to iovne Marcel-Inclinely youth & corage, with Fabius feminine feare and wifedom: and therefore fome yeares they chose them both Consulls together, or else they sent one of them as Consull, and the other as Proconfull, eche in his turne, to the contrie where they hadde warres. And for proofe hereof, Polidonius wryteth, that the ROMAINES at that time called Fabius Maximus their target and Marcellus their fword. Therefore Hanniball him felfe fayed, he feared Fabius Maximus worder of Faas his gouernor, and Marcellus as his enemy: bicause the one kept him from hurting of others, bius & Marand the other did hurt to him selfe. Immediatly after this great victory at CANNES, Hann: bals fouldiers became so bolde, so carelesse, and disordered, that they kept the fielde without search of any thing, and dispersed them selves farre from their campe: wherefore Marcellus setting apon those stragglers, he flue them euery man, & so by little and little did still lessen the power and strength of his enemy. Afterwardes he aided the cities of BIZANTIV M and of NOLA, and Stablished the true deuotion and loue of the BIZANTINES towardes the ROMAINES: from

Bandius aunswered, that he was the man, and therewith shewed him many woundes he had apon his body. Marcellus then replyed: alas, thou that cariest such notable markes of thy vnfained loue towards vs, what diddeft thou meane, that thou cameft not straight againe vnto vs? art thou perswaded we are so miserable & vnthankefull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valliantnesse of our frendes, whom our enemies selues do honor? This occasion drew Hanniball to come hard to the city, seeinge no watche apon the walles, and made him the bolder to come in diforder, imagininge there had bene fome mutinie or fedition within, betwene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus fet open the gates being hard by, and fayling out apon the fodaine with the best men of armes he had, he gaue a charge vpo Hanniball in the voward. Immediatly after came out his footemen at an other gate, running straight vpon Hanniball, with a wonderfull crie and showte: so as Hanniball to withstand them, was dri-

But as he was deuidinge of them, fodainely athird a gate opened apon them, from whence all the refidue of the ROMAINES iffued out, who fette vppon the CARTHAGINIANS on every fide, they being emarueloufly amazed to be fo fodainely fet on, which they looked not for : fo having their handes full with those that came first apon them, beinge scant able to defende them selves against them, and seeinge this news and last charge also: they were forced to retyre. This was the first time, that euer Hannibale fouldiers beganne to give place to the Romaine s, who drave them backe vnto their campe. and flewe a great number of them, and did hurt diverse of them besides. For some wryte, there were flaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, about flue thowsande: and of the ROMAINES there died not past five hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not set out theouerthrow to great and vet confesseth that Marcellus wanne great honor by it, & that it made the the ROMAINES maruelous valliant againe, after so many and fundry battells as they had lost one after an other: for then they were perfwaded that they fought not with an enemy altogether vnuincible, but that he might fomtime also, as well as them selues, receive both losse and hurt, Therefore, one of the Confulls dyinge about that time, the people caused Marcellus to be fent for, & placed him in his roome; and in spite of the Senate they deferred all deputacion untill his returne from the campe. Marcellus came no fooner to Rome, but he was chosen Confull in the deade mans roome, by all the voyces of the people. Notwithstandinge, when they went to choose him, it thundered maruelously: which the Priestes & Augures tooke for an ill token, but yet they durft not openly speake against his election, bicause they feared the people. Shortely after, Marcellus beinge againe chosen Consult the thirde time, went into Sicila For Hannibals prosperous successe and victories had so incoraged the CARTHAGINIANS, 25 they fought agains to conquer this Ilande: and specially bicause that after the death of Hiero-F nimus the tyran, there rose some tumult at Syracvsa. Vppon which occasion, the Romat NES had fent an army thither before, and a Prætor called Appius: at whose handes Marcellus

Whereupon Marcellus having compaffion on them, wrote to the Senate in their fauor, & prayed them that they would graunt him licence to supply the bands of his army, as they diminished, with those poore Romatnes his contrymen. Many reasons passed to, and fro, against this sute: neuertheles, it was concluded in the ende by the Senate, that the common wealth made no reckening of the service of faint selled of the harted men like women : wherefore if Marcellius thought good of their feruice, yer it shoulde Romaines.

This order of the Senate misliked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of Sicilia made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifest wrong, to deny him that fauor, that having done his common wealth such faithful service diverse times, as he had done, he might not restore so many poore Romannes to their honor againe. Nowe, when Marcellus was in Sicile, he received great hurtes and injuries by Hippocrates, general of the Hippocrate Syracy sans: who, to pleasure the Carthaginians, and by their meanes to make him somethal of felfe chiefe Lord of Syracvsa, did put many Romaine citizens to death. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to set them at liberry, there flue in the ayer infinite kindes of shot, and maruelous great stones, with an vncregines at Mar- dible noyfe and force on the fodaine, apon the footemen that came to affault the city by land, E cellus fiege of bearing downe, and tearing in peeces all those, which came against them, or in what place so euer they lighted, no earthly body beinge able to reful the violence of fo heavy a weight: fo that all their ranckes were maruelously disordered. And as for the gallies that gaue assault by fea, some were soncke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of shippes, whereto they fasten their failes, which were fodainly blowen ouer the walles with force of their engines into their gallies, and so soncke them by their ouergreat weight. Other being hoysed up by the prooes with handes of Iron, and hookes made like cranes billes, plonged their poupes into the sea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines fastened within, one contrary to an other, made them turne in the ayer like a whirlegigge, & so cast them apon the rockes by the towne walles, and splitted them all to fitters, to the great spoyle and murder of the persons that were F within them. And sometimes the shippes and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a fearfull thing to fee them hang and turne in the ayer as they did:vntill that casting their against them, that they did vtterly corrupt and difgrace, the worthines & excellency of Geometry, making it to discende from things not comprehensible, and without body, vnto things fencible and materiall, and to bringe it to a palpable fubstance, where the vile and base handie worke of man is to be employed fince that time I fay, handy craft, or the arte of engines, came in the end to be empty, and to breake against the walls, or else to fall into the sea agains, when their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought against the walles, vopon a bridge made of gallies iouned together: that was called Sambuca, by reason of the facion it had like to an instrument of musicke of the same name, which is a harpe. The same sambuca.

heing yet a good prety way of fro the walls, there fell a great stone apon it sent fro the walls, into this engine with fuch a thunder and terrible tempest, brake the fundacion of the engine, and tare all the bridge of the gallies joyned together in peeces, that fusteined it. So that Marcellus being amazed with all, not knowing well what it ment: was glad to retyre quickely, and B fent to make his trompet found the retreate to those that gaue affault by land. Hereupon they fate in counfaill to determine what was to be done, and they refolued, that the next morninge hefore day they shoulde approache the walles if it were possible: bicause that Archimedes engines, which were very strong and hard wounde vp, should by this meanes sende all the force and furie of their stones and thor ouer their heades, and that neere hande also he coulde do no good with them, for that they had not the scope of their leavel and cariage they should have. But Archimedes had preuented this deuise by long preparation before, having made provision of engines for farre and neere, the leanell and carrage whereof was proportioned for all distances: their shot shorte, the arrowes not very long, many holes and arches in the walles one harde by an other, where there were store of crosbowes to kill neere hande, sette in such places.as the enemies coulde not fee them without. Wherefore, when the ROMAINES thought to approche, thinking they had bene fafe and close, that no man faw them: it amazed them all when they were receased againe with infinite shot, and striken to the ground with stones that fell apon their heades like leade: (for there was no parte of all the walles, from whence they had not the like (hotte.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retyre from the walles, And vet when they were further of from them, the arrowes, stones, and other kinde of shotte that flue in euery place amonge them, killed a great nomber of them, scattered farre from thence: fothat many of them were flaine and fore wounded, and diverfe of their shippes splitted, and they not once able to be renenged, nor to hurt their enemies, bicause Archimedes had placed his engines very closely behinde the walles, and not apon the walles in fight of the enemy. So that it appeared the goddes fought against the Romaines, they were so slaine and wounded. and yet they coulde not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstanding, Marcellus escaped with life, fafe from hurt, and mocking his workemaisters and enginers he had in his campe, he sayd vnto them. What, thall we not leaue to make warres with this Briarian enginer and Geometrician here? who fitting still apon the wharfe, in sporting manner hath with shame overthrowen our nauy, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred handes of the Gyants, discharginge at Marcellus one instant fo many shot among vs? For in deede, all the residue of the Syracvsans were, windred as as the body and members of Archimedes preparacion: and he him felfe was the only creature engines. that moued and did all, all weapons else being quiet, and his engines only occupied, to affault and defend. At the length, Marcellus feeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but fee the ende of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the walle, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting loofe some of his engines apon them he would no more approche the walles, nor geue affault, determininge to see if he coulde winne it by longe siege. Notwithstanding,

Archimedes had such a great minde, and was so profoundly learned, having hidden in him the Archimedes onely treasure and secrets of Geometricall inuentions: as he would neuer set forth any booke profoundely.

how to make all these warlicke engines, which wanne him at that time the same & glory, not learned. of mans knowledge, but rather of dinine wifedom. But he esteminge all kinde of handy crast & inuention to make engines, & generally all maner of sciences bringing common commodity

For in all Geometry are not to be founde more profounde and difficulte matters wrytten in more plaine and simple tearmes, & by more easie principles, then those which he hath inuented. Now some do impute this to the sharpnes of his wit & vnderstanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreame paines he tooke, which made these things come so easily from him, that they seemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all, Form man liuinge of him felfe can deuile the demonstracion of his propositions, what paine some he take to feeke it: & yet straight so soone as he commeth to declare & open it, every manthen imagineth with him felfe he could have found it out well enough, he can then fo plainly make demonstració of the thing he meaneth to shew. And therfore that me thinks is like enoughm be true, which they write of him: that he was fo rauished & dronke with the swete intysement R of this Sirene, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgate his meate & drinke, and was careles otherwise of him selfe, that oftentimes his servants got him against his will to the bathes, to washe & annoynt him: & yet being there, he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures, even in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with oyles & fwete fauors, with his finger he did draw lines apon his naked body fo fare was he take fro himself, & brought into an extaly or traunse, with the delite he had in the study of Geometry. & truely rauished with the loue of the Muses, But amongst many notable things he deuised, it appeareth, that he most estemed the demonstracion of the proportion between the Cylinder(to wit, the round colomne) & the Sphære or globe conteined in the fame: forhe demonstración prayed his kinseme & frends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder apon his tombe, conteining a massie Sphære, with an inscription of the proportion, wherof the continent ex-

But now againe to Marcellus, Marcellus during the flege at Syrac vsa, wanne the city of Megares in Sicile, one of the auncientest cities Marcellus in all the Ilande: & he tooke befides, the campe of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES, where he flue victories in aboue eight thousand men, surprising them apon the sodaine, euen as they were preparing lodge, & to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great parte of the champion contried SICILE. & made the cities to rebel that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS parte: & in al the banels a time hard by it:he prouided skaling ladders, & tooke the oportunity of a feaft which the Sr-RACVSANS folemnifed in the honor of Diana, on which day they gaue the felues to al feafting, winnerh Sysporting & playes. So he tooke not only the tower, but filled all the walls round about with armed me before day, & brake open the maine gate & entry of the citie called Hexapyle. And as R the Syracvsans began to stirre, perceiving the Romaines on the wals: Marcellus made his men found their trompets on every fide. Whereupon the SYRACVSANS were fo afraid &2 mazed, that they beganne to flie, thinkinge all the city besides had bene taken, where in deede the greatest & strongest quarter of the city called ACRADINA, was not yet touched: bicauseit is walled in rounde about, and separated from the rest of the citie, which is deuided into two other partes, the one called the newe citie, and the other fortune. The two partes whereof beinge wonne, Marcellus by the breake of the daye forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapyle. And when his Captaynes tolde him he was happie, to winne fo goodly a citie, to easely: they say, that he lookinge about him, and consideringe the greatnesse and statelinesse of the fame, he wept for veriepitie, foreseeinge whereto it shoulde come, thinking with him F felfe what a fodayne chaunge it shoulde haue, when his armie came to spoyle and sackethe fame. For there was not a Captaine that durst denie the fouldiers when they demaunded

A the foovle, and yet were there many that would nedes have it burnt and rafed to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any case, and besides, it was fore against his minde Marcellus to graunt them the spoyle of the goodes and slaves: straightly commaunding them not with- gentlenes. standing, not to lay handes of any free man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any Synagy san flaue. Wherein, though he shewed great fauor and mercy, yet it greued him to see so famous a citie brought to that miserable state: and in the middest of all the joy he had for his victorie. he could not refraine from weeping for pity to fee fo rich and wealthie a citie, in the turning of a hand, spoyled, and brought to nought. For it is sayd, that the riches and goodes taken a way at the facke of Syracysa, were nothinge inferior to the spoyles of Carthage, which Rich Profes was also sacked not longe after that : for the other parte of the city of Syracus a called A-CRADINA, was soone after also taken by treason, and spoyled against the Captaines willes, saninge the kinges treasure, which was reserved to be caried to the common treasure of Rome. SYRACVSA beinge taken, nothinge greued Marcellus more, then the loffe of Archimedes. Who beinge in his studie when the citie was taken, busily seekinge out by him selfe the demonstracion of some Geometricall proposition which he hadde drawen in figure, and so ear- Archimedes nessly occupied therein, as he neither fawe nor hearde any noyse of enemies that ranne vppe faine in his

Notwithstandinge, he spake to the souldier, and bad him tary vntill he had done his conclusion, and brought it to demonstracion: but the fouldier being angry with his aunswer, drew out his sword, and killed him. Other say, that the Romains fouldier when he came, offered the swords poynt to him, to kill him: and that Archimedes when he saw him, prayed him to hold his hand a little, that he might not leave the District of the matter he looked for vnperfect, without demonstracion. But the fouldier makingeno recke- on of Archi-ning of his speculation, killed him presently. It is reported a third way also, sayinge, that cer- medes death. teine souldiers met him in the streetes going to Marcellus, carying certeine Mathematicall instrumentes in a little pretie coffer, as dialles for the sunne, Sphæres and Angles, wherewith they measure the greatnesse of the body of the sunne by viewe: and they supposing he hadde that flue him, as a curfed and execrable persone: and howe he made also maruelous much af-D terwards of Archimedes kinsemen for his sake. The ROMAINES were estemed of arthat time by all nations, for maruelous expert fouldiers, and taken for verie vallyant and daungerous men to be dealt with: but they neuer shewed any example of their clemencie and curtesie, and least of all of any civill manner to any straungers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whose actes did shewe the Greecians then, that the Romaines were more gratious and mercifull, then they. For he did so curteouslie intreate those that hadde to do with him, and the-Marcellus wed fuch fauour to private persones, and also to whole citties: that if there were any crueltie shewed in the citties of Enna, or at MEGARES, or against the Syracus ans, it was racaried some golde or silver, or other pretious Iuells in that litle coffer, flue him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was maruelous sorie for his death, and euer after hated the villen ther through their owne fault and follie that were hurt, then theirs that didde them the hurte. And for profe hereof, I will recite you one example onely amongest many. There is acitie in Sicile called Engrism, it is no great thinge, but a verie auncient citie of name, Engrism a by reason of the trafficke thither, for that there are certeine goddesses to be seene, whome est. they worthip, called the mothers. Some fay the CRETANS were the first builders and founders of the temple there, where you shall see speares and helmets of copper, and apon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and apon others, Vlyffes name also, which are confecrated to these goddesses. This citie stoode altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINI-ANS : and Nicias beinge the chiefest man of the same, was all he might against it, and perswaded them openlie in all their counsailles to take parte with the ROMAINES, prouinge it by many reasons, that his enemies counsaylinge the contrarie, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Whereuppon Nicias enemies fearinge his greatnesse and authoritie, they did conspyre amonge them selues to apprehende him, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIAN'S. But Nicias hearinge of fuche a matter, and findinge that they laye in wayte to take him : vsed this pollicie to preuent their treason. He gaue out openlie with safe.

very ill speeches against the goddesses, and did many things in derogation of their honorand a fayd the fight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but deuise, and that there was no credit to be genen to them. These words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the mischiefe they pretended against him, to him selfe, as the only canser of his owne hurt. So they having appointed a day to apprehende him, by chaunce a common counfaill was kept that day they hadde determined of where Nicias speaking to the peoples. bout matter of counfaill, in the middest of his oration fell to the grounder to the great wonder of the whole affembly, as every man may conjecture. Howbeit never a man sturred, & a prety while after he beganne to lift yppe his head a litle, and to looke gastely about him, with a faint trembling vovce, which he still gathered higher and lowder by little and little, vntill he faweall the people wonderoufly afrayed and amazed, that not one of them durft speake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ranne towardes the gate of the Theater, cryinge out that the goddesses mothers did torment him: and not a man durft once come neere him, nor offer to stoppe him, they were so supersticions and foolishly afrayed of the goddesses, imagining it was some divine punishment. But by this meanes he eafily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all: and he was neuer feeneaf. ter that time to do or speake like a madde man in any thing. His wife that was made printy to his deuise, and furthered his intent, went first and fell downe on her knees before the goddeffes mothers in their temple, as the had hartily prayed vnto them: & faining afterwards the would go feeke her husbande, that ranne vp and downe the fieldes like a madde man, the went out of the city with her litle children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they escape without o daunger, and went vnto Marcellus to Syracvsa. The Engienians afterwards played fuch bounde, as though he woulde have put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with the teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kiffinge his handes, befought him to take pine of his poore citizens, beginning first with those that were his greatest enemies. This good nature of Nicias fo pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, & did no hurt to thecity, and gaue Nicias certeine land, besides many other rich giftes he bestowed apon him. Thus it is reported in the history of Posidonius the Philosopher. Now Marcellus being sent for home by the ROMANES, bicause they had warres in their owne contrie, and even at ROME gateshe departed out of Sicile returning towardes Rome, and caried the goodlieft tables, pictures, n and statues, and other such ornamentes as were in Syracys a, meaning first to beautifie his triumphe with them, and to leave them afterwardes for an ornament to ROME, which before that time neuer knewe what fuch curious workes ment. For, this finenes, and curious tables and imagery, neuer came into Rome before, but was throughly fet out with armor and wespons of barbarous people, and with bloody ipoyles, and was also crowned with monumentes of victories and triumphes of diverse enemies, which were no pleasaunt, but rather feareful fightes to looke apon, farre vnfitte for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminondas did callthe plaine of B OR OTIA, Mars scaffolde, where he kept his games : and Xenophon also called the city of EPHESV s, the armorers shoppe: even so me thinkes (as Pindarus said) they might right ly haue tearmed Rome, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wanne the peoples good willes E much more to Marcellus, bicause he did so passingly set foorth Rome, with such excellentime toves of GREECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other fide, was better beloued of the oldmen:

bicause he brought no such toyes with him from the city of TARENT VM, when he wanneit In deede he brought away golde and ready covne, and much other goodes that were profits-ble: but for images and tables, he left them standing in their places, speaking a thing of great note. Let vs leave the TARENTINEs their goddes offended with them. And furthermorethe noble men were angry with Marcellus, faying, that by this act he had purchased Rome great malice and hate. First, bicause he did not onely leade men prisoners in his triumphe, but the gods also: and secondly, bicause he had filled the people full of pritle pratle, & idle curiosity, spending all the whole day in gasinge, and wondering at the excellency of the workemen, and F

of their workes, where before they woulde fall to their labor, or elfe they went to the warres,

In wicked practifes, he simple was to fee, but he excelld in vertuous dedes and feates that vivorthis bear Norwithstandinge, Marcellus did glory amongest the Greacians them selves, sayinge: that he had taught the ROMAINES to effectine the wonderfull workes of GREECE, which they knewe not before. But at his returne out of Sicile, his enemies procured, that his honor of riumphe was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to do in Si-CILB, and that the warre was not altogether ended, and fearing besides least a third triumphe would make him to much enuied: he was contented with good will to have the honor of the great triumphe, in the mountaine of ALBA only & of the litle triumphe, in the city of ROME. Marcellus This maner of litle triumphe is called in Greeke, Euan, and the Romaines call it Ouatio. And Rome with R this difference there is between them : that in the Onation triumphe, the party to whom it is Onation migraunted, doth not enter into the city apon triumphing charet drawen with four horses, nor who when the doth cary any lawrell apon his head in token of triumphe, nor hath any trompettes or hornes Ossaiim blowen before him, but doth marche a foote with a payer of flippers on his fere, having flutes "imple is. and howboyes playing before him, and wearing a garlande of fyrre tree apon his heade; fo as this maner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasaunt then fearefull fight. And that reason doth flatly drawe me to beleue, that these two kindes of entries they graunted to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victorie: were deuided in the olde time, rather for the maner, then for the greatnes of the doings. For such as had ouercomen their enemies by great flaughter and bloody battells, they did make their entry with pompe of triumphe, that was altogether marshall and terrible, followed with their souldiers armed, and crowned with lawrell garlandes, as their custome was in musteringe their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary fide, that without any exployte of armes returned home with victorie, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law graunted them the honor of Onation triumphe, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an inftrument of pleasure belonginge to peace, and the fyrre tree is a tree consecrated to Venus, which goddeffe, about all goddes and goddeffes doth most detest warres. This second kinde of entry was quation called Ouatio, not as many GREECIANS have taken it, comming of this word Euan, which is a whereofin opinion besides, that parte of this honor did apperteine to god Bacchus, whose surname we cal Euius, and somtimes Thriambus. How beit this is not the true derivation of the name, but after this forte. At the great triumphe and entry made, the Captaine or generall that triumpheth as a conqueror, did offer and sacrifice (by the old orders and ancient customes of Rome) one, of the quite or divers oxen: where at the seconde triumphe called the Ouation, he onely facrificed a mut- triumphe. ton, which the ROMAINES call in their tongue Ouem, and thereof was it called Ouation. And The farifice here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the lawe maker of the Romaine lawes misemphe Qand cultomes, and the law maker of the LACED & MONIANS: how both of them were contra- nation. ry to the other, in appointing their facrifices for victorie. For at Sparta, the Captaine or generall that had done his feate by policy or frendshippe, the sacrifice he did offer vppe to the betwits the goddes, was an oxe: and he that by force, and bloody battell had obtained victory, only offred Spartens and his seruice, that by his wisedom & wise perswasions obteined victory: then of his, that wanne est for victor it by valliantnes, and force of armes. Thus may you see which of these two lawemakers hadde vie. best reason in his ordinaunces. But nowe to Marcellus againe. He beinge chosen Consult the fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did stirre vppe the Syracus against him, and The Syracus vpa cocke for facrifice. For though they were very good fouldiers, yet they thought better of Romainer in voyce and fong of ioy, although they did vse also to accompanie the Captaines making their called, entry in this forte, crying and finging Euan: but there were certeine GREBCIANS that would n haue fetched the derivation of this word, from an old common custome they had: & were of MAINES. Marcellus beinge facrificinge one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were fette in counsaill: the Syracvs ans deputies came before them, & kneeling downe, befought the to giue them audience, & that they would do them inflice. The other Confull that was prefent rebuked them, being angry they had so maliciously spyed the occasion of Marcellus absence.

344 But when Marcellus hearde of it, he straight left of all, and came to the Senate, and first fane A him downe in his Confulls chayer, where he gaue audience as Confull, and dispatched diuerfe causes; when he had done so, he rose out of his chayer, and came downe among them standinge as a private persone to aunswere at the barre, as other offenders and men accused fuffering the Syracy sans to alleadge and fay against him what they would. Then were the Syracysans blancke, when they faw the maiefty of Marcellus, and his stayed countenance in all thinges: fo that having founde him before a very valliant man in warres and vnconque. rable, they found him then a man no leffe dreadful in his Confuls robe: that they hong downe their eyes, and durft not looke him in the face. Notwithstanding, they being suborned by his enemies, beganne at the length boldely to accuse him, and yet with sorow and lamentacion. the effect whereof was this. That they beinge the ROMAINES frendes and confederates, had a abidden such injuries at Marcellus handes, as all other generalles neuer offred their vervene. mies. Whereto Marcellus straight aunswered againe to the contrary. That for many injuries being Confull, the ROMAINES had received of the, they suffred nothing but that, which was unpossible they thould not fuffer that refisted vntill they were taken by force: and yet they might thankethem could not alleage for their excuse, that the tyrans had compelled them to make warres:when they to the contrary, bicause they would enter into warres, were contented to be subject to a tyran. So, when both parties hadde spoken their mindes, the Syrac vs ans (as the maneris) went out of the Senate house, and Marcellus also, leauinge his fellowe Consull in his placein C

his countenaunce nor wonted looke, neither for feare of fentence, nor for malice or angeragainst the SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his judgement. Afterwards when the Senators voyces were gathered together, and that Marcellus was cleared by the most voyces: then the SYRACVSANS fell downe at his feete weeping, and befought him not to wreake his angera-pon them that were present, and moreouer that he would have compassion of the residue of the citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confef-fed them selves bound to him for ever. Marcellus moved with pity by their intreaty, he pardoned them, and euer after did all the Syrac vs ans what pleafure he coulde possible. For through his intreaty and request, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his graunt vnto them, D which was: that they might vie the liberty and benefit of their owne lawes, and quietly enjoy their goodes also which were left them. To requite this special grace procured them by Marcellus, the Syracvs ans gaue him many honors, & among others they made a law, that euer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or house came into Sicile, the Syrac vs ans should kepe a folemne feast, with garlands on their heades, and should also facrifice vnto the goddes.

After this, Marcellus went against Hanniball. And where all the other Consults almost, & ge-Marcellus neralles, after the ouerthrow at CANNES, had vsed this only policie with him, not to come to battell: he tooke a contrarie course to them all, thinkinge that tract of time, (whereby they his fearth Confullship.

LIE: and that Fabius Maximus standinge to much vpon safety, tooke not the way to cure the E disease and weakenes of the common weale of Rome, looking to ende this warre, consuming by litle and litle the strength and power of Rome, committing a fearefull phisitions fault and error, being afraid to heale their pacient fodainly, imagining that to bring them low, doth leffen the disease. So, first of all he went to besiege certeine great cities of the SAMNITES, which were revolted from obedience of the ROMAINES: and those he wanne againe with a great prouision of corne and money he founde in them, besides three thousande souldiers Hanniball left in garrison there, whome he tooke prisoners. Hanniball after that, havinge slaine the viceconful Cneus Fuluius in APVLIA, with eleven Tribunis militum (to wit, Colonels, every one havinge charge of a thousande footemen) and overthrowen the greatest parte of his armie Marcellus wrote letters to Rome, hoping to comforte the Senate & people, telling he would F go thither, and did warrant them he woulde drive Hanniball out of APVLIA. When the Ro-MAINES had red his letters, they were nothing the more coforted, but rather (as Linie writeth)

a more afraid and discouraged: bicause they doubted the daunger to come woulde be greater. then the loffe past, takinge Marcellus to be a farre greater and better generall, then ever was Fuluius. But Hanniball refused, and marched his way thence: 10 as Marcellus thereby had good leafure left him to strippe his slaine enemies. and also to bury his owne fouldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemie by the foote, who layed many ambushes for him, but he coulde neuer trappe him in any: and in enery encounter or skirmishe they had together, Marcellus hadde ener the better, which wanne him great fame and credit. When he had fayed, he appointed they thoulde gene those bandes that first turned their backes to Hanniball, barley for wheate. So, as there were many of them in great daunger of their liues, for the fore woundes they hadde geuen them in the battell: yet was there not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more greue them, then a the greuous woundes they had. This made Marcellus ill spoken of at Rome, and caused his enemies to take holde of such a matter against him: for they straight raised Publius Bibulus Tribune, to accuse him, who was a hotte harebrained man, but very eloquent, and coulde deliuer his minde very well. So this Bibulus called the people oft to counfaill, and tolde them there, that they must nedes call home Marcellus, and appoint some other to take charge of the army: for as for him, fayd he, bicause he hath sought a little with Hanniball (and as a man might fay, wrestled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to solace him selfe. But Marcel F hearing this, left his Lieutenantes in the campe, and went him felfe to Rome, to aunswer to the vntrue accusations layd against him, and there he perceived at his comming, how they

A intended to profecute the matter against him apon these informations. So a day of hearinge was appointed for his matter, & the parties came before the people affembled in counfaill, in the great liftes or show place, called Circus Flaminius, to give indgement. There Publius Bibulus Circus Flathe Tribune, fitting in his chayer, layd open his accusation with great circumstance: and Mar-minius. cellus, when Bibulus had tolde his tale, aunswered him in few wordes, and very discretely, only touchinge his purgation. But the noble and chiefest men of the citie, rose vppe, and spake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainely, that they did Marcellus wrong, to recken worfe of his valliantnes, then their enemy did: and to judge of him as a coward, confidering Hanniball only fled from him, of all other Captaines, and would by no meanes fight with him, neuer refusinge to fight with any other whatsoeuer. These perswasions tooke such effect, as where B Marcellus accuser looked for his condenation: Marcellus to the contrary, was not only cleared

Whereuppon they fought to keepe Marcellus still at Rome, who had a maruelous earnest desire to be gone with speede to the warres: for neuer man longed for any thing fo much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hanniball. Whereupon Marcellus determined to goe see the place him felfe, taking a few horsemen with him. Notwithstanding, before he would take horse, he call led for his Soothfayer to facrifice to the goddes. The first beaft that was facrificed, the Soothfaver shewed Marcellus the liner of it without a head. The second beast facrificed, had a faver great head of a liner, and all the other partes were also sounde, and very newe: that by theme appeared al the feare of the first ill signes and tokens were taken away. Quintus Cri-

So Marcellus tooke his horse, with Quintus Crispinus his fellow Consull, and his sonne one finus fellone of the Tribunes of the fouldiers, having onely two hundred and twenty horsemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among them, but all were THYSCANS, fauing for ty Fregellanians, who from the beginning of these warres had alwayes shewed themselues very faithfull and louing to Marcellw. The hill we spake of before, being thicke course with wodde and bushes, the enemies hadde set a skowte to watche on the toppe of it, to gene warning if they faw any comming towardes it. The Romaines could not fee him, and hem the other fide might fee euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done, as he did aduertife those at that time that lay in ambushe for Marcellus comminge: and they suffered him to passe on, vntill he came directly against them. Then they shewed vpon the sodaine, and compassing in Marcellus, they both thot and strake at him, some following them that fled, andother fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which only stucke to it: who came roundly in together (not with standing the THVSCANS were fled) apon the first crie they heard, to defend p the two Confulls, vntill fuch time as the Confull Crifbinus havinge two woundes on his body with a dart, did turne his horse to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus such a fore blowe with a fpeare havinge a broade iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left alive, beinge but a few in number, seeinge Marcellus slaine, hill of Pete. left him lyinge on the grounde, and tooke his fonne away with them that was very fore hur, and by the swiftnes of their horses recourred their campe, and saued them selues. At thisouerthrowe, there were not flayne aboue fortie men, and fine and twentie taken prisonners, of which, fine of them were the Confulls sergeauntes, and their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horsemen. Within few dayes after, the other Consull Crispins died also of his hurtes, which was such a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES, E that both their Confulls were flaine at one battell. Now Hanniball made no great reckeninge of all that were flaine, or taken at this fielde: but when he heard that Marcellus felfe was flaine at this ouerthrow, he went him felfe straight to the place to see him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, standing hard by it, and considering his strength, his stature, and comtenance, having taken full view of all the partes of him, he spake no proude word against him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as some other would have done, that had slaine so valliant

Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus wryte it thus: but Livie, and Augustus Casar say, that the pot was caried vnto his sonne, and honorably buried. In the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temples of the gods called Cabires:many images and tables he brought from Syracusa. And in the Ile of Lindos, in the temple of R Minerua, where among other, there is a statue of his, and this epigramme grauen under it, as Polidonius the Philosopher wryteth.

Seven times he Confull chofen was, in which he overcame, great numbers infinite, (in open fielde and fight) of such as sought his contries spoyle, and put them all to flight.

The author of this epigramme reckeneth, the two times of his being viceconfull, for two whole Confullihippes: but his posteritie continued alwayes in great honor, vnto Marcellus, Marcellus C the sonne of Octawia, (Augustus Casars sister) and of Caius Marcellus. He dyed a young man, be- possion. ing Ædilis of Rome, & maried vnto Iulia, Augustus daughter, with whom he lived no log time. But to honor the memory of him, Octavia his mother built the library, and Augustus Casar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and library.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

Hele are the greatest thinges and best worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Islancellus doinges: and for their maners and Marcellus naturall condicions otherwise, they were all one, bicause they were afterin ware. both valliant, painefull, and noble minded: fauing that this difference onely was betwene them. That Marcellus in many cities he tooke by affault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much bloode: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did never put any to the fword they ouercame, neither did they take away the libertie from any citie they tooke: and it is thought the THEBANS woulde not have handeled the ORCHOMENIANS fo cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had bene present. Nowefor A their actes, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of service that Marcellus did, with so small a company of horsemen as he tooke with him, to ouerthrow so great a number of horsement footemen both, of the GAVLES: a thinge that neuer Generall but him felfe did, and specially that flewe with his owne handes in the fielde, the Generall of his enemies. Which Pelopida could neuer attaine vnto: for he feeking to kill Alexander the tyran of PHERES, was flaine find him selfe, and suffered that, which he defired to have done to an other. And yet for that feruice may be objected, the battells of Levetres, and of Tegyra, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambushe or secrete practife Marcellus & done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he flew the tyrans that kept Thebes in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and sodaine an enterprise stolen apon, as none was euer greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hanniball, who was a dreadfull and a violent enemy: fo were the THEBANS also at that very time with the LACED & MONIANS, who notwithstanding were a uercome of Pelopidas, at the battells of TEGYRA, and of LEVCTRES. Wheras Marcellus did neuer fo much as once ouercome Hanniball, as Polybius wryteth, but remained vnconquered alwayes, vntill that Scrpio ouercame him in battell. Notwithstandinge, we do geue best credit to the reportes of Cafar, Liuie, Cornelius Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GREECIANS; who wryte, that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hanniballs companies, however they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to speake of, & it seemeth rather, it was through some mockerie or deceite of that African, then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter, and worthy much comendacion, that the ROMAINES were brought to that corage, as they durk abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, having lost so many great overthrowes, & having fo many generalls of their armies slaine in battell, and having the whole Empire of Romein fo great daunger of vtter destruction. For it was Marcellus only of all other generalls, that put the ROMAINES in hart againe, after fo great and longe a feare thorowly rooted in them: and incoraged the fouldiers also to longe to fight with their enemy, and not onely to hope, butto affure them selues of victory. For, where by reason of their continual losses and searefullouerthrowes they hadde, they thought them selues happy men to escape Hannibals handes by then any generall in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, should compare with the good happe of the other that was never ouercome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the city of Syrac vs a, & Pelopidas failed of taking the city of Spar-TA: but yet do I thinke, that it was more valliantly done of Pelopidas, to come so neere Spar-TA as he did, and that he was the first that passed the river of Evroras with an army, which neuer enemy did before him, than it was of Marcellus to winne all Sicile. Vnles some paraduenture will fay againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas acte, as also in the victorie of LEVCTRES: where no man living can pretend any parte of glory to the doinges of Marcellus. For he tooke SYRACVSA, being onely generall alone, and did ouerthrow the GAVLES with E out his fellow Confull, and fought with Hanniball, without any mans helpe or incoragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the maner of warres the ROMAINES vied then, and that trained his fouldiers, that they durft fight Rashner in a with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, and the straungeneffe of either of their deathes doth greue me marueloufly: as I do greatly wonder also, how Hanniball in so many battells as he sought (which are innumerable) could alwayes scape virhurt. I can not but greatly commende also the valliantnes of one Chrysant as, whom Xenophon speaketh of in his booke of the institucion of Cyrus, saying: that he having lift up his sword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, and hearing the trompet found the retreate, he foffly retyred, & would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused : for befide that he was very hot and defirous of battel, yet his anger was honorable and iuft, and moued him to feeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides fayth:

The best that may betyde, is wwhen a captaine lives. and doth furuine the victories, which he with force achieues. But if he needes must fall, then let him valliantly euen thrust amid the thickest throng, and there wwith honor dye.

For so becometh his death famous, & not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there an other respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he faw his victorie ended, in the death of the tyran. Otherwise he shoulde hardly haue founde fo noble an occasion to haue shewed his valliantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and havinge no cause of heate or choller, (which putteth all men valliant in fight befides them selues, that they know not what they do)did rashly, and vna aduitedly thrust him selfe into the middest of the daunger, where he dyed not as a generall, hut as a light horseman and skowt, (for sakinge his three triumphes, his fiue Consullinippes, and his spoyles and tokens of triumphe, which he had gotten of kinges with his owne hands) among venturous Spaniards and Numidians, that foldetheir blood and lives for pay vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: fo that I imagine they were angry with the felues (as a man would (av) for so great and happy a victory, to have slaine amongest Fregellanianskowtes, and light horsemen, the noblest and worthiest person of the ROMAINES. I would no man should Phinach exthinke I speake this in reproch of the memory of these two samous men, but as a griese onely such bus fee of them and their valliantnes: which they imployed so, as they bleamished all their other ver- freeth and tues, by the vndiscrete hazarding of their persones and lines without cause, as if they woulde the famous and shoulde have dyed for them selves, and not rather for their contry and frendes. And also men. when they were dead, Pelopidas was buried by the allies & confederats of the city of THEBES, for whose cause he was staine: and Marcellus in like maner, by the enemies selues that hadde Marcellus Marcellus slaine him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the of fineralls vather is farre aboue it, and more to be wondered at. That the enemy him selfe shoulde honor his valliantnesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the office of frendshippe performed by a thankefull frende. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honor his deade enemy, then the admiration of his worthines : and the frende sheweth frendeship many

des, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goodes and wealth. they diverfely write of him. For some say, he lived poorely all the daies of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reason of their po-Querty, liued vnmaried many yeres after their fathers death. And many of the oldest writers do cofirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phaleriws, in his booke intituled Socrates, wryteth the contrary: that he knew certeine landes Aristides had in the village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Ariftides lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to thew that he was well to line, and that his house was rich and wealthy, he bringeth foorth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare mayer or prouost of A THENS. whom they called, Archon Eponymos, bicause the yeare tooke the name of him that haddeir yearely. And they fay he came to it, by drawing of the beane, according to the auncientyle of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of makinge their election of the faid office: In which election none were admitted to drawe the beane, but fuch as were highest set in their fubfidie bookes, according to the value & rate of their goodes, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosiomedimnes, as you would say, those that might dispend fine hundred bushels of wheate by the yere, and vpwards. Secondly, he alleageth he was banished by the Ostracismon, which banisheth the nobilitie and great rich men onely, whom the common people enuie, bicaule of their greatnesse, and neuer dealeth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes is, that he left of his gift, three footed stooles in the temple of Bacchus, which those do common-C ly offer vp, as haue won the victory in comedies, tragedies, or other fuch like pastimes, wherof they them selves had borne the charge. And those threefooted stooles remaine there yet, which they say were geuen by Aristides, and have this inscription vppon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Ariftides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archestratu the Poet taught them to playe his comedies. This last reason, though it seeme likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whome euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes lived in great povertie) and Plato the Philosopher, tooke apon him to defraye the charges of games that were of no small expence, the one hauing borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the dawnce of the children which dawnced in a rounde at ATHENS: towards the furnishing of which charges, Dionthe SYRACVS AN gaue Plato money, and Pelopidas also gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not fooken that vertuous men should alwayes refuse the gifts of their frends, and that they might not in some sorte accept their frendes curtesie offered them: but bicause they should thinke it. Good men vncomely and dishonorable for them, to take any thing to enrich them selues, or to spare and wifes, but afhourde vp. Howebeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike thow to be straffere. made, not tending to their private benefit: in such a case they should not refuse their frendes louing offer, and goodwill towardes them. And where Demetrius faith the three footed stoole was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panetius declareth plainely, that Demetrius was deceaued by the femblance of the name. For fince the time of the watres of the MEDES, vnto the beginninge of the warre of Peloponnesus, in all the registers and recordes kept of the defravers of the charges of common playes, there were founde but two men bearinge name of Ariftides, that obteined victory : & neither of them both was fonne vnto Lysimachus, whom we wryte of at this present. For the one is expresly named the sonne of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the same Ariftides we now speake of : as appeareth easily by the wrytinge and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we have vied in GREECE ever fince Euclides time. Moreouer it is easie to be knowen, by the name of the Poet Archestratus that is adiouned to it. For there is no man that maketh mencion of a Poet of this name, in all the warres of the Medes: but in the time of the warres of Peloponnesus, many doe put him in for an author and maker of rymes and fonges that were fong in common daunces, Yet for all Panatius objections, the matter is to be better looked into, and confidered of. But for the Ostracisinon banishment, it is true, that such as were great men in estimacion aboue the common people, either in fame, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were subject vnto this banishment. For Damon himselfe, beinge Pericles schoolemaister, was banished: onely bicause Damon benithe common people thought him to wife. Moreouer, Idomeneus wryteth, that Ariftides was shed bicaufe their prouost for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voyces of the ATHEN IANS that chose here to wife. him. And if he were prouost fince the iorney of PLATEES, as Demetrius wryteth: it is likely enough that they didde him this honor, for his great vertue and notable feruice, which other were wont to obteine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defende Ariftides, but also Socrates pouerty, as if it were a fowle vyce and reproche to be poore. For he wryteth, that Socrates was he had not only a house of his owne, but also three score and ten Minas at vsery, which Criton nospoore. gaue him interest for. But now to our story againe. Aristides was Clisthenes very frend, he that reflored the government at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty tyrannes, and did reuerence Lycurgus the Lawinaker of the LACED & MONIANS for his lawes, about all the men in histime: and therefore he euer fauored the state of Aristocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the fouerainty. Howbeit he euer had Themistocles (Neocles fonne) his continuall aduersary, as takinge parte with the contrary, and defending the popular state of gouern- fieth. ment. Some fay, that being schollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary one Themssockes

by processe of time between them: for (sayeth he) both the one and the other of them fellin loue with Stefileus, borne in the Ile of CEOS. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not eafily from them, nor the enuy they conceived one against an other, but continued against eche other in matters of state : such was their malice towardes one an other. In which calling, Themistocles fought the way to winne frendes, by whose meanes he came to great preferment in shorte to another in all their actions and doinges, were it in sporte, or in matters of earnest: and euer enemies in after, men beganne to fee the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrary affections, the common For Themistocles was quicke, nimble, aduction us, and subtill, and would venter on any thing, Themistocles apon light occasion. Notwithstanding, Aristus

F time, and had made him selfe very strong by them. Therefore, when a frende of his tolde him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of ATHENS, and were very fitte for it, if he were Themissocles indifferent, and not partiall. The goddes forbid (quod he) I should euer occupie the place of a significant partial of the significant partial gouernour, where my frendes shoulde not finde more fauor then straungers, that doe meno A pleasure. But Aristides taking an other course by him selfe, would not stande apon his frender bolftring of frendes, but to his owne iust and vpright doings. Notwithstanding, Ariftides per. and hindered his doings: he was enforced somtime to crosse Themistocles againe, & to speake in gouernment. First, bicause he woulde do no man wrong, with pleasuring his frendes; no vet would anger them, by denying their requestes. Secondly, bicause he saw many rulers and men of authority bolde to do iniuftice, and manifest wrong, bearinge them selues apon their frendes: but he caried this opinion, that no honest man, or good citizen, shoulde trust to any ceiuinge that Themistocles did rashly alter many thinges, and euer encountered all his waves. against that he preferred, partely to be even with him, but most to hinder his credit and an thority, which increased still through the peoples fauor and goodwilles towardes him: thin, a king it better by contrarying him a litle to disapoint sometime a thing that might have fallen out well for the common wealth, rather then by geuing him the head, to suffer him to grow to great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themistocles having preferred a matter year profitable for the common wealth, Ariftides was fo much against it, as Themistocles purpose tooke no place. Moreouer Ariftides was so earnest against him, that when the counsaill brake vp after Themistocles motion was rejected, he spake it openly before them all: that the common wealth of ATHENS would neuer profper, vntill they both were laid in Barathrum, which was a prison or hole, wherein they put all theeues and condemned men. An other time. ristides moved a matter to the people, which diverse were against, but yet it went with him. And when the judge or prefident of the counfaill did put it to the people, to knowe their allo wance of it: Ariftides perceiuing by the argumentes made against it, that the matter hepreferred was hurtfull to the common wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not have it paffe. Many times also Aristides spake by other men, when he would have a thing go forward, for search least Themistocles spight towardes him, woulde hinder the benefitte of the common wealth. They founde him very constant and resolute in matters of state, what socuer happened: which wanne him great commedacion. For he was neuer the prouder for any honor they gaue him, nor thought him felfe differaced for any ouerthrow he received: being alwayes of this minde. that it was the duety of an honest citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to doe his contry service, without respect and hope of reward of money, or for honor and glory. Therefore when certeine verses were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of AEschilm, [] made in commendacion of the auncient Soothsayer Amphiaraus, to this effect. He vvill not only sceme, a just man by his face. but iust indede he will be founde, and vertue still embrace: VV ith all his thought and foule, from wwhence there may procede, grave counsells for to beau vtifie, his contries crowwne in dede. All the people straight cast their eyes vpon Aristides, as vppon him, that in troth aboue all other most deserved the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so stoute and resolute, not only to refift fauor and frendthippe: but to reiect hate and anger also. For in case of instice, neither coulde frendshippe make him go away for his frendes fake: nor enuy coulde moue him to do iniustice, to his very enemy. For proofe hereof it is wrytten, that he had an enemie of his in E fute of law, & did profecute it to judgement: infomuch as after the plaint was red, the judges were so angrie with the offendor, that without any more hearinge of him, they woulde have geuen sentence against him. But Aristides rising from his place, went & kneeled at the judges feete with the offendor his enemy, and befought them to geue him leave to speake, to instiffe and defende his cause, according to the course of the law. An other time he being judge betwene two private men that pleaded before him, one of them fayd vnto him: Ariftides, this Arifider wife fellow mine aduerfary here, hath done you great injurie. My frende (quod Ariftides againe)! pray thee tell me onely the iniury he hath done thee, for I am judge here to do thee right, and

A accompt, Themistocles, and many other suborned by him, were against him, and accused him for abufing his office, and followed him so hard, that through their practife they condemned willide se him, as Idomeneus wryteth. Yetthe noblest citizens feeing what initry they offered Ariftides, offed & commoke his cause in hande, and founde meanes to procure the people not onely to release the demned of fine imposed upon him, but to restore him againe to his office of high treasorer for the yeare office. following: in the which he seemed to repent his former straightnes and gouernment theyere Arifidet fine hefore, and fo dealt more fauorably with those he hadde to do, and would not examine every himself tree-thing so straightly as he did before. Whereupon such as were theeues and stealers of the trea- forer agains. fure of the common wealth, did maruelously praise and like him, and became suters for him m continew in the office. But when the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS woulde choose him againe, Ariftides selfe reproued them, and sayd. When I faithfully discharged the duety of mine office committed to me by you, I then received shame and reproche at your militar of handes: and now that I have diffembled, not feeminge to fee the theftes and robbeties done penty repreapon your treasure, ye claw me, and say I am an honest man, and a good citizen. But I would thethe in the vouknew it, and I tellyou plainely, I am more ashamed of the honor you do me now, then I comm wealth, was of the fine you did fet apon me, when you condemned me the last yeare: and I am forie and desested to speake it, that you shoulde thinke it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, then to preserve the common wealth. After he had spoken these words, and had bewrayed the common theftes the officers of the city did committhe stopped the theeues mouthes that so highly praised and commended him for so honest a man, but yet of the noble and honest citizens Chewas much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darins king of Persia, was come with all his nauy to go a lande about Marathon, in the contrie of At-TICA, apon pretence (as he fayd) to be reuenged onely of the ATHENIANS that had burnt the city of SARDIS, but in dede of minde to conquer all GREECE, and to destroy the whole conmebefore him: the ATHENIANS chose tenne Captaines to go to the warres, amonge whom Miltiades was the chiefest man of authority. But Aristides drew very neere him in reputacion and creditte, bicause he did very good service in obtaining the victorie, specially when he a- Militades greed with Miltiades in counfaill, to geue battell apon the barbarous people : and also when thiefe of the he willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the army. For every one of the tenne that went a Captaines did by turnes leade the whole army for one whole day: and when Ariftides turne 8 ainst Datitie came about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Militades, teaching his other companions, the king that it was no shame, but honor for them, to be ruled by the wifest. Thus by his example, he Lieuenant. appealed all strife that might have growen amonge them, and perswaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counfaill, that had best experience in warre. And so he did Person. much aduaunce Miltiades honor. For, after that Ariftides had once yelded his authority vnto him, every one of the rest did the like when it came to their turne: and so they all submitted themselves vnto his rule and leading. But on the day of the battel, the place where the A THE-might fet apon it : they thereupon fent away presently nine tribes that marched thither with such speede, as they came to ATHENS the very same day, and lest Aristides in the campe at not my selfe. Moreouer, he beinge chosen high treasorer of all the reuenues of ATHENS, did MARATHON, with his tribe and contry men, to looke to the prisoners and spoyle they hadde declare that all the officers before him, and other his late predeceffors, hadde greatly robbed F wonne of the barbarous people. NIANS were most combred, was in the middest of the battell, where they had set the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, and made their greatest fight in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles and Aristides fighting they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one an other: so as the barbarous peo-pleat the last being ouerthrowen, they made them flie, and draue them to their shippes. But when they were imbarked & gone, the Captaines of the ATHENTANS perceiving they made not towardes the Iles which was their direct courfe to returne into A sia, but that they were driven backe by storme of winde and pyrries of the sea, towardes the coast of ATTICA, and the city of Athens, fearinge leaft they might finde Athens vnfurnished for defence, and had taken of theirs: he was not so couetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any other mi medle with them, vnleffe by fealth some prouided for them selues. As amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres Priestes, called Dadouchos, as you woulde saye the torche bearen (for in the secret sacrifices of Ceres, his office was to holde the torche) whom when one of the barbarous people faw, and how he ware a bande about his head, and long heare, he toke him for fome king, and falling on his knees at his feete, kiffed his hand, and shewed him great store of golde he hadde hidden and buried in a ditche. But Callias, like a most cruell, and cowards wretch of all other on the earth, tooke away the gold, and killed the poore foule that had the wed him the place, bicause he shoulde not tell it to others. Hereof it commeth, that the comicall Poets do call those that came of him in mockery, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a dirch Arifides the- bicause of the golde that Callias founde in it. Immediatly after this battell, Aristides was the R fen prouost of Athen's forthe yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a little before his death, after the iorney of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they fet in order their prouosts of ATHENS for the yere, since Xanthippides time, there appeareth no one name of Ariffides in that yeare, that Mardonius the kinge of PERSIAES Lieutenant was ouerthrowen by PLATEES, which was many yeares after. But contrariwife they finde Aristides enrol. led amonge the prouostes immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did most commende Aristides instice, as of all other his yer. tues and qualities: bicause that vertue is most common and in vie in our life, and delivereth most benefitte to men. Hereof it came, that he beinge a meane man, obteined the worthieft Arifides cal- name that one coulde have, to be called by the whole city, a just man. This furname was ne-c uer defired of kinges, princes, nor of tyrannes, but they alwayes delited to be furnamed, fome Poliorcetes, to fay, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to fay, lightening or terrible: other Nicanores, to fay, subduers: and some other, Aeti and Hieraces, to fay Eagles or Fawcons, or such like birdes that praye: desiringe rather (as it should appeare by those surnames) the praise and reputacion growinge by force and power, then the commendacion that rifeth by vertue and goodnes. And notwithstanding, God whom men desire most to be likened to, doth excellal humaine nature in three special thinges: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the most honorable and pretious thing. For as the naturall Philosophersteafon, all the foure elements and Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and fo are force and power, earthquakes, lighteninge, terrible stormes, runninge rivers, and inundacions of wa- n ters: but as for justice and equity, no man is partaker of them, faue onely God, by meanes of The traife of reason and understandinge. Therefore, bicause men commonly haue three sundry honors to the gods: the first, that they thinke them blessed: the second, that they seare them: the third that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleffed, for the eternite and immortality of their godhead: that they feare them bicause of their omnipotency & power: and that they loue and worthippe them, for their fuffice and equitie. And yet not with

fo power, which dependeth most uppon fortune: and in the meane time they leave vertuea-

selues sooles. For justice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, seems we corruption divine and celestials: where without instice, and dealing evniustly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the worlde. But now againe to Arifides. This furname of a just man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwardes it turned him to great ill will, and specially by Themistocles practise. Who gaue it out every where, that Aristides had overthroemieth Ari- wen all instice, bicause by consent of the parties he was euer chosen Arbitrator to endeal controuerfies: & how by this meanes he fecretly had procured the absolute power of a king. not needing any gard or fouldiers about him. The people moreouer beinge growen very difolute and licentious, by reason of the victorie of MARATHON, who sought that all things should passe by them, and their authoritie: beganne nowe to mislike, and to be greatly offended, that any private man should go before the rest in good same and reputation. Whereapon, they came out of all shyeres of ATTICA into the city of ATHENS, and so banished Arifides with the Oftracismon: disguising the enuy they bare to his glory, with the name of search A oftwanny. For this maner of banishment called Ostracismon, or Exostracismon, was noor- The name dinary punishment for any fault or offence committed : but to gene it an honest cloke, they of the Offen awdit was onely a pulling downe and tying shorte, of to much greatnesse and aurhority, exreeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwise, the a gentle meane to qualify the peoples enuy against some private person: which enuv bred no malice to him whose greatnes did offende them, but onely tended to the banithing of him for tenne yeares. But afterwardes that by practife, this Offracismon banishment was layed apon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the last man so ba- Hyperbolus nished: they neuer after vsed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way, it shall not be amisse the last man to tell you here, why, & wherfore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the the Ofracifchiefestmen of ATHENS at that time, and they both were euer at iquare together, a common mon. thing among eft great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples affembling, that they went The cause of the people is a fembling, that they went the people is a fembling. about to execute the Ostracismon, were maruelously asrayed it was ment to banishe one of banishment. them: wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers frends with eche other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, infomuch, when the most voyces of the people were outhered to condemne him that should be banished, they founde it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to fee the Offracismon so embased and scorned, that they neuer after woulde vie it againe, and so left it of for euer. But briefely to let you understande A description what the Oftracisimon was, and after what sorte they vsed it, ye are to know : that at a certaine of the Oftraday appointed, enery citizen caried a greatshell in his hantle, whereupon he wrote the name cifmon. of him he woulde haue banished, and brought it into a certeine place railed about with wodden barres in the market place. Then, when every man hadde brought in his shell: the magistrates, and officers of the city, did count and tell the number of them. For if there were leffe then fixe thow fand citizens, that had thus brought these shels together: the Offracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they layd a parte enery mans name written in these shels: and whole name they founde wrytten by most citizens, they proclaimed him by founde of trom-should move many other to do the like, wherin they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man. For before that he was called home, he continually trauelled vp and downe, perfivading and incoraginge the Greecians to mainteine and defende their liberty. After that lawe was repealed, and published, and that Themistocles was chosen the only Lieutenant generall of ATHENS, he did alwayes faithfully aide and affift him in all thinges, as well with his trauell, asallo with his counfaill: and thereby wanne his enemy great honor, bicaufeit stoode apon the safetie and preservation of his contrie. For when Eurybiades, generall of the armie of the GREECIANS, had determined to for sake the Ile of SALAMINA, & that the gallyes of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and had enuironned the Iles all abour, & the mouth of the arme of the straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus

pet, a banished man for tenne yeares, during which time notwithstanding, the party did enioy all his goodes. Now euery man wryting thus his name in a shell, whom they would haue banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the contry (very simple) that coulde neither wryte, nor read, who came to Ariftides (being the first man he met with) & gaue him his shell, Aide of a praying him to wryte Ariftides name vpon it. He beinge abashed withall, didaske the contrie plaine man man, if Ariftides had euer done him any displeasure. No, sayed the contrie man, he neuer did that come to mehurt, nor I know him not: but it greeues me to heare every man call him a just man. Ari- bis field, to flides hearing him fay fo, gaue him no aunswere, but wrote his ownename vpon the shell, and pray him to deliuered it againe to the contrie man. But as he went his way out of the citie, he lift vppe his write Ariflihandes to heaven, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, befechinge the goddes that the ATHENIANS might neuer haue fuch troubles in hande, as they shoulde be compelled to call for Arifides againe. Notwithstandinge, within three yeares after, when Themistocles cles, if we be both wife, it is high time we should now leave of this vaine enuie and spitewe haue longe time borne eche other, and that we should enter into an other forte of enuy more honorable and profitable for vs both. I meane, which of vs two should do his best indeucro faue GREECE: vou, by ruling and commaunding all like Lieutenant generall: and L.by counfelling you for the best, and executing your commaundement: consideringe you are the man alone that will roundlieft come vnto the point that is best: which is in my opinion, that we shoulde hazard battell by sea within the straight of SALAMINA, and that as soone as might be possible. But if our frendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you vour enemies do helpe it forward. For it is favd, that the fea, both before and behinde vs. and R rounde about vs. is covered all over with their shippes, so as they that would not before shall be now compelled offorce, and in spite of their heartes, to fight and besturre them like more bicause they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to escape nor to flie. Whereunto Themistocles aunswered. I am fory, Aristides, that herein your home. fly appeareth greater then mine: but fince it is fo, that you have deserved the honor in begin. ning, and procuring such an honorable and commendable strife between vs. I will henceforth indeuor my felfe to excede you in continuing this your defire. After which aunswere, he told Ariftides, how he purposed to mocke the barbarous kinge, and prayed him to intreate Fund biades to yelde to his deuise, & to perswade him that there was no other way to saue GREBCE. but to fight by lea: for Eurybiades gave more creditte to Ariftides perswasions, then he did no Themistocles wordes. For when all the Captaines were called to counsell, to determine who ther they should gene battell or not: one Cleocritus Corinthian favd to Themsstocles, that his counfell did not like Aristides at all, as it seemed, bicause he spake neuer a worde to it being present. Aristides answered him straight, that he vtterly mistooke him. For, quod he, is I did not thinke his counsell good. I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, not for any good will I beare him, but bicause I finde his counsell wise and sounde. While the Cap-Ariflides vi- taines of the GREECIANS were reasoning in this sorte, Ariflides seeing PSYTTALEA (2 little Hory at Phil- Ilande before SALAMINA within the straight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valliantest and lustiest souldiers he hadde of all his contry men, into the least foyftes or pynnasies he had among all his gallyes: and went with them, and landed in that lle, n triumphe were set there. After the battell was wonne, Themistocles to feele Aristides opinion, fayed vnto him: we have done a good peece of feruice, but yet there is an other behindeof greater importance, and that is this. We must bringe all Asia into Evrops, which we may easily do, if we faile with all speede to the straight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge Arifides wife the king hath made there. Then Arifides cried out, stay there, neuer speake of that: but I pray you let vs rather feeke al the wayes we can how to drive this barbarous king out of GREECE, Xerxes fring leaft if we kepe him in still with so great an army (and he shall see no way before him to escape out) we drive him then to fight like a desperate man, and perill our selves, we can not tell to what. When Themistocles had hearde his opinion, he secretely sent the evenuke Arnaces his prisoner, vnto kinge Xerxes, to advertise him from him, that he had altered the GREECIANS Astratageame purpose, which was fully bent to haue broken up the bridge he hadde made at the straightof l HELLESPONT, to passe ouer his army: and that he was the willinger to let him understande it, that he might the better prouide for the fafety of his person. King Xerxes being netled with this advertisement, tooke straight his iorney, and with all speede went to recover the straight xorne less of HELLESPONT, and left Mardonius his Lieutenant general in GREECE, with three hundred Mardonius thow and of the best souldiers of his army. This Mardonius was maruelously dreaded of all hant in the GREECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he hadde by lande, and he did threaten them Greece with also by his letters he wrote vnto them. You haue, (fayed he) with your shippes by sea, ouer- 300000.men. come men acquainted to fight by lande, and that neuer handeled ower: but now, the plaines of The SSALIE, or the fieldes of BOROTIA, are very fayer and large for horsemen and footemen to make proofe of their valliantnes, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the Athenians, by the kinge his maisters commaundement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to builde up their city againe, to gene them a great pencion, and furthermore to make them Lordes of all GREECE, so they woulde gene oner, and leave of these warres. The LACED & MONIANS beinge forthwith aduertised of his letters wrytten to the A-THENIANS, and fearing least they would have bene perswaded by them: sent their Ambassadors with al speede to ATHENS, to pray them to send their wives and children vnto SPARTA. and also to offer them vittailles, to relieue their poore olde people, bicause of the great scarcity that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt and raled, and all their contry besides defroved by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS having heard the offers of the Ambassadors of LACEDEMON, made them a maruelous answer through Arifides counsell, and this itwas. That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all thinges were to be minde of the fold for gold & filuer, bicause they esteemed nothing more pretious, nor better in this world, Athenians. then to be riche and wealthy: but on the other fide, they were greatly offended with the LACE-

DEMONIANS, that they only regarded the present pouerty and necessity of the ATHENIANS. and did forget their vertue and noble corage, thinking to make them fight more valliantly for the preservacion of GREECE, by offering them vittells to live withall. The people approving this aunswere, Aristides then caused the Ambassadors of Spart a to come to the assembly. and commaunded them to tell the LACED & MONIANS by worde of mouth, that all the golde aboue, or vinder the grounde, coulde not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any fumme of money or reward, to leave the defence of the liberty of GREECE: &to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he shewed him the sunne, and sayd vnto him : so long as yonder funne keepeth his course about the worlde, so long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies D vnto the PERSIANS, bicause they have spoyled and destroyed all their contry, and have defiled and burnt the temples of their goddes. Besides, he willed that the Priestes, by commaundement of the people, should excommunicate and curse him that woulde procure them to fende vnto the Persians to make peace with them, and to breake their league and allyance with the other GREECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the seconde time to ouerrunne the contry of ATTICA: the ATHBNIANS got the againe into the Ile of SALAMINA and then they fent Ariftides Ambassador unto the LACED EMONIANS. He sharpely tooke them vp, and reproued their floth and negligence, bicause they had againe for saken ATHENS. and left it to the spoyle of the barbarous people : and prayed them yet they woulde looke to faue the rest of GREECE. The Ephori (which were certaine officers that ruled all things with-E in the city of Sparta) when they had hearde Ariftides perswasions: straight tooke order for ayde, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their solemne feastes they called Hyacinthia. Howebeit the next night following, they fent out fine thowfande citizens borne in Sparta, into the fielde, all proper men and valliant fouldiers, euery one of them carying with him, feuen Ilotes (which are the contry men and slaues in the contrie of LACED & MONIA) not making the Ambassadors of ATHENS priny to it at all. Wherefore Ariftides came againe an other time into their counsell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughinge, and fayd he dreamed, or else he mocked them: for their army which they had fent against the straungers (for so they called the PER-SIANS) was already at the city of ORESTION in ARCADIA. Arifides hearing their aunswere, replyed, that they were to blame to mocke them in that forte, to fende away their men fo fecretly, that they might not knowe of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceine their frendes, but their enemies rather. oracles of the all, but only defend. And Aristides, that had fent to the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the Platees.

The Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the toppes of mount CITHERON, looking towards the west, where the sphragitides. funne setteth in sommer. They say there was an oracle there in old time, whose spirit possesses many inhabitants thereabouts, and bestraught them of their wittes: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepty, as who would say, taken with the Nymphes. And againe total the ATHENIANS they shoulde have the victory, so they did hazard battell in the plaine of Cares Eleusinian, and within their owne territorie: it was euen to sende them backe againeint the contry of ATTICA. Ariftides being thus perplexed, Arimnestus Captaine of the Plat El-ANS, hadde such a vision in the night in his sleepe. Him thought that Iupiter the fauior didappeare yntohim, and asked him what the GRE BCIANS intended to do ? and that he answered D my Lord, we must to morrowe remoue our campe into the territories of ELEVSIN, and there we will fight with the barbarous people, accordinge to the commaundement the oracle Apollo hath genen vs. Then that Iupiter replyed, that they were greatly deceaned: for all that Apollo had declared by his oracle was ment within the territorie of the PLATEIANS, and that they shoulde finde it true, if they considered it well. Arimnestus havinge plainely seene this vision in his sleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he straight sent for the oldest citizens, and confideringe with them where this place (houlde be, he founde at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHERON, by the city of NYSIA, there was an olde temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleusinian, and of her daughter Proserpina. When he hearde them say so, he went straight and tolde Aristides of it, and sounde that it was an excellent place to set an army E in battell rave, that hadde but fewe horsemen : for that the foote of mount CITHERON did lette the horsemen, they coulde not goe to the place where the temple stoode, and wherethe playne and valley did ende : besides also, that the chappell of Androcrates was even in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wodde rounde about it. And bicause they should lacke nothing to hinder the expresse commaundement of the oracle for hope of victory: the PLATEIANS (through Arimnestus counsell and aduise) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLATEE sthould be taken away towardes ATHEN stide, and that the lande Platzians. thereof shoulde be geuen clearely vnto the ATHENIANS, bicause they shoulde fight with the barbarous people in their owne lande, for the defence and preferuation of GREECE, accordinge to the commaundement of the oracle. This noble gift and present of the PLAT EIANS was so famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great having conquered the Empire of Asia, built up the walles againe of the city of Plates, and when he had done, madea

A heraulde openly proclaime it at the games Olympicall: that Alexander hadde done the PLA-TEIANS that honor and dignitie, for a memoriall and honor of their magnanimity. Bicause in the warre against the PERSTANS, they had freely and liberally genen away their lande vnto the ATHENIANS, for the fafetie of the GREECIANS: and had shewed them selves of a noble corage also, and very willinge to defende the state of GREEGE. Now when the army of the Swifebernene GREECIANS came to be fette in order of battell, there fell a strife betwene the ATHENIANS the Athenians and the TEGEATES, bicause the ATHENIANS would nedes (according to their old custome) haue the left wing of the battell, if the LACED EMONIANS had the right winge; and the TE-GEATES on the contrary parte, woulde have the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alleaging the famous acts and notable feruice of their auncesters in former warres, whereupon R the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Aristides stept between them, and told them, that it was no Aristides time now to contende with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valliantnesse: and as for wifely paciyou, my Lords of Sparta, fayed he, and you also my maisters of Greece : we tell you, that fieth the muthe place neither geneth nor taketh vertue away, and we doe affure you that wherefocuer you place vs, we will so defend and kepe it, as we will not impayre nor blemish the honor we have wonne in former foughten battells, and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarell and fall out with our frends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to bragge of our ancesters doings, but to show our selues valliant in defence of al GREECE. For this battail wil make good proofe to all the GREECIANS, how much estimacion every city, every Captaine, & particular person wil deserue for his parte. When Aristides had spoken, the Captaines & all other of the counsel concluded in fauor of the ATHEN IAN S. that they should have one of the winges of the battell. But by this meanes, all GREECE stoode in maruelous garboyle at that time, and the state of the ATHENIANS specially in great daunger. For a number of the noblest chizens of ATHENS. And that brought great fubstance with them to the warres, being now at The confinalow state, & in pouerty, their goods being spent & gone, & seeing the selues discountenaced, eyes therich not bearing that rule & authority in the common wealth they were wont to do bicause other noble men of were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the citie: they gathered together, and Athens. met at a house in the city of PLAT MES, & there conspyred to ouerthrow the authority of the people at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpose, then that they would rather loofe all, and betray their contry vnto the barbarous people. While thefe thinges were pra-D difed in the campe, many beinge of the conspiracy, Aristides came to an Incklinge of it, and was maruelously afrayed, bicause of the time: wherefore he beganne to be carefull of the marter, being of fuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to viderstand the whole conspiracy, litle knowing what a number might be drawen into this treason if it were narrowly looked into, but rather respected that which was iust, then what was profitable for the time. So he caused eight persones only of the great number to be apprehended, and of these eight, the two first whom they would have indited as principalles, and were most to be burdened for the conspiracy, AEschines of the towne of LAMPRA, and Egestias of the towne of ACHARNA, they founde meanes to flie out of the campe, and to faue themselues. And for the other, Arifides fet them at liberty, and gaue them occasion that were not discouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: faying, that the battell should be their judge, where they should purgethem selues of all accusations layed against them, and show the world also, that they neuer had any other intencion but honest, and good, towards their contry. Mardonius, to proue the corage of the GREECIANS, had fent all his horsemen, (wherein he was farre stronger then the GREECIANS) to skirmish with the. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITHERON, instrong places and full of stones, fauing the three thowsande MEGARIANS, that camped in theren. the plaine: by reason whereof, they were foretroubled and hurt, by the horsemen of the barbarous people that sette vppon them on enery side, for they might charge them where they woulde. Infomuch, in the ende, perceiuinge they alone could no longer refult the force of fo great a multitude of the barbarous people : they fent with all speede possible to Pausanias, to p pray him to fend them prefent aide. Paufanias hearing this newes, and feeing in his owne fight the campe of the MEGARIANS almost all couered with shot and dartes which the barbarous people threw at them, & that they were compelled to ftand close together in a litle corner: he wist not what to do. For to go thither in person with the LACEDE MONIANS that were foot A men heavy armed, he thought that was no way to help them. So he proved to put fomeam. bitious desire and enuy of honor, among the private Captaines and generalls of the army of the other GREECIANS, which were then about him: to fee if he coulde moue any mans co. rage and defire, to offer him felfe willingly to goe aide the MEGARIANS. Howebeit they had all deafe eares, but Ariftides: who promifed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the fielde, (one of the valliantest Captaines that served vnder him) with his company of three hundred chosen men, and certaine shot mingled amongest them. These souldiers were ready in a moment, and marched straight in battell ray, a great pacetowards the barbarous people. Malifrim, that was generall of the horsemen of the Persians,

The ATHENIAN'S taried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very home. bicause both the one and the other side did the best they could at this first onset to put the rest of the battell in leopardy: and they fought follong, that Mafifius horse was shot through the

to the GREECIANS that they had sped well at this skirmishe not bicause they had slaine many enemies, but for the great lamentacion the barbarous people made for the loffe of Mafifting, For his death did so greue them, that they powled themselves, they clipped of their horse and movles heares, & filled befides all the field therabouts with pitiefull cries & threekes, as those that had loft the valliantest and chiefest man of authority of all their campe, next vnto Madonius the kings Lieutenant. After this first skirmish, both the one and the other side kept their campe, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the Soothfayers did promite both fides the victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GREECIANS, fo they did but onely defend : and contrary wife, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowen, that did affault. But Mer. D donius finding vittells waxed feant, and that they were stored but for few dayes, and moreover how the GREECIANS daily grewe stronger by continual repayre to their campe, the lenger he delayed in the end he resolued to tary no lenger, but to passe the river of As op vs the next morning by breake of the day, & fodainly to let apon the GREECIANS. So he gaue the Captaines warning the night before what they should do, bicause every man should be redy; but about midnight there came a horseman without any noyse at all so neere to the GREECIANS campe, that he spake to the watche, and told them he would speake with Aristides, generall of the ATHENIANS. Ariftides was called for straight, and when he came to him, the horseman kinge of Ma- faid vnto Aristides. I am Alexanaer king of Macabon, who to the code at this present time we cedan, renta- beare you, have put my self in the greatest dauger that may be to come at this present time we leave you have you beared bicause your enemies faid vnto Aristides. I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great good will I aduertife you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will give you battel: bicaufe your enemies fodaine comming apon you, should not make you afrayd, being fodainly charged, and should not hinder also your valliant fightinge. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight: but only scarcety of vittells that forceth him to do it, considering that the prognosticators are all against it that he should geue you battel, both by reason of the il tokens of their facrifices, as also by the auniwers of their oracles, which hath put all the armie in2 maruelous feare, and stande in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to putte all at aduenture, or else if he will needes lye still, to be started to death for very famine. After king Ale xander hadde imparted this secrete to Aristides, he prayed him to keepe it to him selfe, and to remember it in time to come. Arilides aunswered him then, that it was no reason he should keepe a matter of fo great importance as that, from Pausanias, who was their Lieutenant generall of the whole armie: notwithstandinge, he promised him he woulde tell it fians secrete counsell unto

ARISTIDES. A no man else before the battell, and that if the goddes gaue the GREECIANS the victorie, he did affure him, they should all acknowledge his great fauor and good will shewed ynto them. After they hadde talked thus together, kinge Alexander left him, and returned backe againe; and Ariftides also went immediatly to Paufanias tent, and tolde him the talke kinge Alexander and he hadde together. Thereupon the private Captaines were sent for straight to counfaill, and there order was genen, that enery manne shoulde have his bandes ready, for they shoulde fight in the morninge. So Paulanias at that time (as Herodotus wryteth) faved vnto Ariftides, that he woulde remoue the ATHENI ANS from the left to the right winge, bicaule they shoulde have the Persians them selves right before them, and that they shoulde fight fomuch the lustier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also bicause they hadde ouercommed them before in the first encounter; and that him selfe would take the left winge of the battell, where he shoulde encounter with the Greecians that fought on the PRESIANS fide. But when all the other private Captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderstoode ir, they were maruelous angrie with Paulanias, and layed he did them wronge, and hadde no reason to lette all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, and onely to remoue them, as if they were flaues, to be appointed at his pleasure, now of one fide, then of the other, and to fette them to fight with the valliantest fouldiers they had of all their enemies. Then fayed Ariftides to them, that they knewe not what they fayed, and how before they misliked, and did striue with the TEGEATES, onely for havinge the left wing of the battell, and when it was graunted, they thought them selues greatly honored that they were preferred before them, by order of the Captaines: and nowe where the LACED & MO-NIANS were willing of them selues to geue them the place of the right winge, and did in maner offer them the preheminence of the whole armie: they do not thankefully take the honor offered them, nor yet doe recken of the vantage and benefitte geuen them to fight against the PERSIANS selues, their auncientenemies, and not against their natural contry men anciently discended of them. When Aristides had vsed all these perswasions vnto them, they were very well contented to chaunge place with the LACED EMONIANS: and then all the talke amonge them was to encorage one an other, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came against them, had no better hartes nor weapons, then those whom they before hadde ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For faved they, they have the same bowes, the same riche imbro-D dered gownes, the fame golden chaines and carcanettes of womanishe persones, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint hartes: where we have also the same weapons and bodies we hadde, and our hartes more lively and coragious then before, through the fundrie victories we have fince gotten of them. Further, we have this advantage more. That we doe not fight as our other confederates the GREECIANS do, for our city and contry onely, but also to continewe the fame and renowine of our former noble feruice, which we wanne at the iorneys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the ende the worlde shoulde not thinke that the glory of these triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltrades onely, or vnto fortune, but vnto the corage and worthineffe of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GREECIANS throughly occupied to chaunge the order of their battell in hast. The THEBANS on the other side that tooke The measure parte with Mardonius, receiving intelligence of the alteringe of their battell, by traytors that of the Theranne betwene both campes: they straight tolde Mardonius of it. He thereupon did sodain-bane. lyalso chaunge the order of his battell, and placed the Persians from the right winge to the left winge of his enemies: either bicause he was afrayed of the ATHENIANS, or else for greater glorie that he hadde a desire to fight with the LACED E MONIANS, and commaunded the Greecians that tooke his parte, that they should fight against the Athenians. This alteracion was so openly done, that euerie manne might see it: whereuppon Pausanias remoued the LACED EMONIANS againe, and lette them in the right winge. Mardonius feeinge that, removed the Persians againe from the left winge, and brought them to the right winge (where they were before) against the LACED & MONIANS: and thus they con-mies did continually trouble and spoyle that water they had about them, with their horses, A

Now when night came, the Captaines woulde have marched away with their men, to go to the lodginge they had appointed: but the people went very ill willinge to it, and they hadde much a do to keepe them together. For they were no fooner out of the trenches and fortification of their campe, but the most parte of them ranne to the citie of PLAT EES, and were maruelously out of order, dispersing them selues here and there, and set up their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that and longed fore for battell: he was in fuch a rage with these triflinge delayes, that he criedin out in the campe, that this remouinge was a goodly runninge away, and tware he woulden not from thence, but woulde there tary Mardonius comminge with his companie. Paulanias went to him, and tolde him he must doe that the other GREECIANS hadde consented to in counsell, by most voyces. But Amompharetus tooke a great stone in his handes, and threwit

So he fent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwardes on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might goe together; and therewithall made the The bastell of rest of his menne to marche towardes the citie of PLAT RES, supposing thereby to have the Greecia, drawen Amompharetus to have followed him, or elfe he ment to remaine alone behinde, But in triflinge thus, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderstandinge that the GREECIANS did for O pant, aims co.

17 of Plance. fake their first lodging, he made his army presently marche in battell ray to sette apon the La-CED #MONIANS. So the barbarous people made great showtes and cries, not thinking to goe fight, but to goe facke and spoyle the GREECIANS flyinge away, as in deede they did litle better. For, Paulanias seeinge the countenaunce of his enemies, made his ensignes to stay, and commaunded every man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to geve the GREECIANS the fegnall of the battell, either for the anger he tooke against Amompharetus, or for the sodayne onset of the enemies, which made them that they came not in straight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begonne, but stragglinge in small companies, some here, and some there, In the meane time, Paulanias was bulie in facrificinge to the goddes, and feeinge that the full facrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothfayers observations they made: he D commaunded the Spartans to throwe their targettes at their feete, and not to sturre out of their places, but onely to doe as he bad them, without refiftinge their enemies. When he hadde geuen this straight order, he went againe and did sacrifice, when the horsemen of the enemies were at hande, and that their arrowes flewe amongest the thickest of the LACED A-MONIANS, and did hurte diverse of them, and specially poore Callicrates amonge thereth, that was one of the goodliest menne in all the GREECIANS hoste and armie. He having his deathes wounde with an arrow, before he gaue vppe the ghost, sayed his death did not greek him, bicause he came out of his contrie to dye for the defence of GREECE: but it greued him to dye fo cowardly, having egeuen the enemie neuer a blowe. His death was maruelous kmentable, and the constancy of the SPART ANS wonderfull: for they never stirred out of their Mitethe che- places, nor made any countenaunce to defende them selues against their enemies that came apon them, but fuffred them selues to be thrust through with arrowes, and slaine in the field, lookinge for the houre the goddes would appoint them, and that their Captaine would commaunde them to fight. Some wryte also, that as Pausanias was at his prayers, and doing sacrifice vnto the goddes a litle behinde the battell, certeine of the Lydians came apon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his facrifice : and how Paufanias, and those that were about him, (hauinge no other weapons in their handes) draue them awaye with force of states and whippes. In memorie whereof, they fave there is a foleinne procession kept at Span-TA on that daye, which they call the Lydians procession, where they whippe and beare younge boyes about the aulter. Then was Paufanias in great diffresse, to see the Priestes offer facrifice vpponfacrifice, and that not one of them pleafed the goddes: at the laft he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holdinge vp his handes, befought Iuno Catharon, and all the other goddes, (patrones and protectors of the contry of the Plateians) that if it were not the will of the goddes the GREECIANS thoulde have the victorie, yet that the conquerors at the least should buie their deathes dearely, and that they shoulde finde they fought against valliant men and worthy souldiers. Pausanias had no sooner ended his prayer, but the facrifices fell out very fauorable, infomuch the Priestes and Soothsayers came to promise him victory. Thereupon, he straight gaue commaundement to march toward the enemy, which flew from man toman incontinently how they shoulde march. So as he that hadde seene the Squadro of the LACED EMONIANS, would have faid it had bene like the body of a fierce beaft raifing up his briftels, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people faw they shoulde haue a Barteill behorte battel, and that they should mere with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the PERSIAN facion, & bestowed their Greecian & arrowes lustely apon the LACED & MONIANS. But they keeping close together, and coueringe

enemy fo lustely, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thrustes and blowes of their pikes & speares apon their breastes, and ouerthwart their faces, that they flew many of them, and layed them on the grounde. For all that, they dyed not cowardly, but moke the LACED & MONIANS pikes and speares in their bare hands, and brake them in two by frength of their armes: and then they quickely pluckt out their cimeters and axes, and luftely laved about them, and wrong the LACED EMONIANS shields out of their hands by force, and came a speedy messenger vnto them sent from Pausanias, to let the vnderstand they were figh-

on a great pace ouer the playing, vinto that parte where they heard the noyle: the GREECIANS that were on Mardonius fide came against them, Aristides seeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his company, & cried out as loude as he could for life, and conjured the GREECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GREECE, to leave of these warres, and not to trouble the ATHENTANS that were going to helpe the that ventured their lives, to

And this is the cause why the AFE. entermance tides made a solemne sacrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order genen them by the oracle of Apollo, to gene them thankes for this victorie. Of the LACED & MONIANS there dyed foure score and eleuen: and of the TEGEATES, fixteene But I maruell Herodotus fayth, that none but these people onely fought in that iorney against the barbarous nation, and no other GREECIANS belides: for the number of the dead bodies and their graves also do shewe, that it was a generall victorie and exployte of all the GRID CIANS together. And Moreouer, if there had beene but these three people onely that hadde fought against them, and that all the rest had stoode and looked on, and done nothinge: fure there had bene no fuch epigramme as this, engrauen apon the alter or tombe that was fet vo in the place of the battell.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Boedromion, that is, about the moneth of Iuly, or after the Bobotians accompt, the fix & twenty of the moneth, they call Panemus, on which day there is yet kept a common affembly of the estates of GREECE, in the cities of PLATES, where the PLATEIANS make a solemness. crifice vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, to gene him thankes alwayes for this victorie. Forthe ATHENIANS would not geue place vnto the LACED & MONIANS, nor fuffer them to fet vp any tokens or fignes of triumphe. Whereupon the GREECIANS running to armes in mutinie to gether, by this occasion they had almost spoyled one another: had not Aristides through his wisedom and wife perswasions, stayed, and quieted the other Captaines his companions, and specially one Leogrates and Myronides, whom he wanne with such discrete and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbitrement and judgement of the ther people of GREECE. So the GREECIANS met in the same place together, purposely decide their controuersie. In this counsell holden there, Theogiton a Captaine of the Magain RIANS, fayd for his opinion, that to avoide the civil warre might growe betwene the GREE CIANS apon this quarrell: he thought itvery requifite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victorie, vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. Apon his wordes, Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIAN'S behalfe, and then Paulanias for the LACED & MONIANS, that the PLAT & IANS should have the reward. Now they both beinge agreed, before the spoyle was deuided between them, they sette aside foure foore talentes that were genen to the PLAT E IANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and fett out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACED & MONIAN'S notwithstanding, did set up their tokens of victorie by them selues, and the ATHENIANS theirs also by them selues. So, they sending vnto the oracle of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do facrifice: Apollo aunswered them that they shoulde builde vp an aulter vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, howbeit that they shoulde put no facrifice vpon it, vntill they had first nut out all the fier through the whole contrie, bicause it had bene polluted and defiled by the harbarous people: and then, that they shoulde fetche pure and cleane fyre at the common aulter, whereon they doe facrifice vnto Apollo Pythias, in the city of DELPHES. This auniwer heing deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GREECE went through all the contries to put out the fyre enery where. And there was a man of the fame city of PLATEBS at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered him felfe, and promifed he woulde bringe them fyre from The worder-

So when he came to the full Behedde for city of Delphes, after he hadde sprinckled and purished his body with cleane water, he put a Placeton, a Placeton, a crowne of lawrell apon his heade, and went in that manner to take fyre from the aulter of A-foose, pollo. When he had done, he hyed him againe as fast as he coulderonne for life, vnto the citie of PLATERS, and came thither before the funne was fet, having commen and gone that day athowfande furlonges. But after he hadd faluted his citizens, and delivered them the fyre he brought: he fell downe dead at their feete, and gaue vp the ghost. The PLATEIANS lift him vo starke deade, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renowme: and Diana Eucaused afterwards this Epitaphe following to be grauen upon his tombe.

wealth, and withal more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. When The inflice of the people heard Ariftides aunswere, they willed Themistocles to lette his denisealone whatthe Athenias focuer it were: fo great inflicers were the ATHENIANS, and fo much did they trust Ariftides Arifides and wifedom and equitie befides. So they made Arifides afterwards generall of the army of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, & fent them to make warre against the barbarous people. Arifides at his comming thither, feeing Paufanias, & the other Captaines that were generals I gainstite bar- ouer the whole army, dealinge hardly, and churlishely with people their confederates: heon the contrary fide, spake gently vnto them, and shewed him selfe as curteous and familiar to them as he coulde possible, making his companion also familiar to all, and just to every body, not oppressing some to ease other, in defraying the charges of the warres. Aristides takinge fice and ver- this course, it was not noted howe by litle and litle he cutte of the rule and authoritie of the LACED EMONIANS in GREECE, not by force of armes, nor by shippes, nor by numbers of horses, but onely by his graue and wife gouernment. For if the instice and vertue of Aristides, their rule and and the myldenes and curtefy of Cimon made the government of the ATHENIANS to be liked of, and accepted of all the other people of GREECE: the couetousnes, pride, and siercenesse of Paulanias, made it much more to be defired. For Paulanias neuer spake vnto the other Cap's proude and taynes of the people, allyes, and confederates, but it was euer in choller, and he was to sharp with them : and for the poore private fouldiers, he woulde cause them to be cruelly whipped

A for every small offence, or else to make them stande a whole day together on their feete, layinge a heavy iron ancker apon their shoulders. No man durst goe forrage, neither for strawe cruell puninor reedes to make them couches of, nor durft water their horse before the Spartans : for him of his he had sette skowtes for them to whippe them home, that went out before them. And one day when Ariftides thought to have spoken to him, and to have tolde him some thinge : he frowned apon him, and fayed he hadde no leafure to speake with him now, and so would not heare him. Whereupon the Captaines of the other GREECIANS, & specially those of CHIO. of Samos, and of Lesbos, did afterwardes follow Ariftides, and perswaded him to take a-Don him the charge and authority to commaunde the other people of GREECE, and to take into his protection the allyes and confederats of the fame, who long fithence wished to repole from the government of the LACED & MONIANS, and onely to submitte them selves vnto the ATHENIAMS. Arsfides aunswered them thus: that they had not only reason to doe that they favd, but that they were also constrained to do it, Notwithstanding, bicause the ATHENIANS might have good grounde and affurance of their vidoubted fidelitie and good feruice, they Avillides fina shoulde deliuer them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some famous act attemp- triall of may ted against the LACED EMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst neuer fall from the tors. league of the Athenians. inges. And like as the auncient men in olde time did celebrate, and fing out the bleffednes of mucceffer. those that lived vnder the raigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age : even so did

Arifides, calling it the fortunate & bleffed time of GREECE, and specially, when shortly after it did double, and treble on the sodaine. For the taxe Aristides made, came to about soure hundred & three score talents: and Pericles raised it almost vnto a third parte. For Thucydides maruelous rage against them, and threatned them that before it were longe he woulde make them knowe they had bene better to have affaulted their owne naturall contrie, then to have fet vpon him as they had done. But they aunswered him, and bad him get him away quickely and he were wife, and let him thanke fortune hardly, that graunted the GREECIANS victory at the battell of PLAT EES vnder his leading: and that it was nothing else but the onely reverence and respect of the same, that had made the GREECIANS hold their hands till now from geuing him that iust punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserued. So the end was, they left the LACED EMONIANS, & stacke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherin was easily discerned the great corage, and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACED EMONIANS. For when they fawe their Captaines were marred and corrupted, through the ouergreat authority, & liberty they rance of the D had, they willingly gaue up their commaundement ouer the other GREECIANS, and did no Laced amonimore fende their Captaines to be generalls of the whole army of GREBCE: thinking it better and for their citizens, that they should be obedient, and in enery point observe the discipline and law of their contrie, then if they had bene otherwise the only rulers and Lords ouer the whole contrie. Now at what time the LACED & MONIANS did commaunde all GREECE, as Lordes: the cities and people of GREECE did pay a certeine fumme of money, towardes defrayinge of the charges of the warres against the barbarous people. But after that their seigniorie and rule was taken from them, the G REEC IANS were contented a taxe should be leavied, and that euery city should be reasonably sessed, accordinge to their wealth and abilitie: bicause euery citie might know what they shoulde pay. And after the death of Pericles, theo. rators and counsellers for matters of state did raise it vp higher by litle and litle, vntil it moun. ted vnto the summe of thirteene hundred talentes. And this was not, bicause the warres did rife to fogreat a charge, by reason of the length of the same, and of the losses the ATHENIANS had received: but for that they did accustome the people to make distributions of money by hand vnto every citizen, to make them fet vp games, and make goodly images, and to builde fumptuous temples. Thus was Ariftides therefore justly honored, praised, and esteemeda. boue all other, for this iust imposition of taxes, saving onely of Themsstocles: who went vp and downe flering at the matter, fayinge it was no mete praise for an honest man, but rather for a to be even with Arifiides, which was nothing like the sharpe girde Aristides gave him openly, when Themistocles talking with him, tolde him it was an excellent thing for a Captaine to be able to know, and to preuent the counfells and doinges of the enemies: and so is it, saved Ariftides againe, not onely a needefull, but an honest thinge, and mete for a worthy generall of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Ariftides made all the other people of GREECE to sweare, that they woulde truely keepe the articles of theallyance, and he him felfe as generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their othes in the name of the ATHENIANS: and so pronouncing execrations & curses against them that should break the league and othe taken, he threw iron wedges red hotte into the sea, and prayed the gods to destroy them even so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstandinge, afterwardes the (in my opinion) when there fellout great alteracion in the state, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS tolet him beare the daunger and burden of periury and execration, and that they should not let for feare thereof to do any thing whatloeuer they thought mete or necessary. To conclude, Theo-

Arifides pre- phrastus wryteth, that Aristides was not only a perfect an honest, and just man, in private matferred neces- ters betwixt party & party: but in matters of state, and concerning the common weale, he did before Lan e

many thinges oftentimes accordinge to the necessitie of the time, and troubles of the cine. wherein violence and iniustice was to be yed. As when the question was asked in open counfell, to know whether they might take away the gold & filuer that was left in the Ile of DELOS fafely layed up in the temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres against the bar-D barous people, and to bring it from thence vnto ATHENS, apon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the articles of the allyance, made and sworne amonge all the GREECIANS. Arifides opinion beinge asked in the fame, he auniwered: it was not just, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Ariftides had brought his citie, to rule and command ried in his po- many thousandes of people: yet was he still poore for all that, and vntill his dying day he gloried rather to be praised for his pouertie, then for all the famous victories and battells he had wonne : and that plainely appeareth thus. Callias Ceres torche bearer, was his neere kinfeman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stoode in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Judges, his accusers very faintly, and to lide purpole, vttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other byematters. E left the chiefest matter, & spake thus to the Judges, My Lords, you alknow Aristides the some of Lysmachus, and you are not ignoraunt also that his vertue hath made him more esteemed, then any man else is, or can be, in all GREECE. Howe thinke ye doth he live at home? when you see him abroade uppe and downe the city, in a threde bare gowneall to rattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all fee quake for very colde, beinge so ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his coin germaine the richest citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable: that notwithstandinge Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authoritie among you, he suffered him, and his poore wife and children readie to begge, to starue for any helpe he geueth him.

Callias perceiuing the Iudges more angryer with him for that, then for any matter elfe he was F accused of : he prayed Aristides might be sent for, and willed him to tel truely whether he had willes. So Ariftides confirmed all he spake to be true; and enery man that was at the hearinge alkamed of of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Ariftides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by AEschines the Socratian Philosopher: and Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithstandinge there were many other famous and notable mended of men of ATHENS, yet he gaue Ariftides praise aboue them all. For others, fayd he, (as Themi-Plato. flocles. Comon, and Pericles) have beautified the citie with stately porches, and sumptious builn dinges of golde and filuer, and with stone of other fine superfluous deuises : but Aristides was only he, that vertuously disposed him selfe and all his doinges, to the furtherance of the state pouerty, then him felfe coulde of his riches: (which he fayd many did vie ill, and few coulde A hard thing vie them wel) and that it was a hard thing to finde one man of a noble minde, that could away with pouertie, and that fuch onely might be ashamed of pouerty, as were poore against their Vilio may be and common weale. His iustice and good nature appeared plainely, in his doinges and behamour towardes Themistocles. For though Themistocles was cuer against Aristides in all things, Aristides in and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practile he was banished from A- perancer and THENS: yet when Themistocles was accused of treason to the state, having diverse sharpe ene-Themistocle. mies against him : as Cimon, Alemaon, with diverse other : Aristides sought not revenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither spake nor did any thinge against him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioyce to fee his enemie in mifery, no more then if he had never enuied him in his prosperity. And touching Aristides death, some write he dyed in the realme Aristides

But Craterus the MA-CEPONIAN Wryteth of his death in this forte. After that Themistocles (fayeth he) was fled, the people of ATHENS became very stubborne and infolent: whereupon, many lewde men grew to be common appeachers and accusers of the noble men and chiefest citizens, and to stirre vpthe malice and ill will of the common people against them, who were waxen proude by reason of their prosperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Amonge the rest, Aristides was condemned for extorcion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, apon one Diophantes ac-demned for culation, of the village of Amphit Rope: who burdened him, that he tooke money of the Io- extercion.

And it is no new, not straunge thing, that the people of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe, and to relieve, the women that dwelt in the citie: confidering that in times past, Aristogiton having a litle daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poorestate, and that coulde not be bestowed in manage for her pouerty, they caused her to be brought to ATHENS, and maried her in one of the noblest houses of the city, and made her a joynter besides in the village of Potamos. THE LIFE OF Marcus Cato the Censor.

Areus Cato and his auncesters, were (as they say) of the city of THY-SCVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and delt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt & liued in the contry of the SABYNES, vpon certeine land his father left him. And though to many his auncesters were knowen to have bene obscure: yet he him self did highly commende his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and faying he was a fouldier, and had ferued valliantly in the fielde. And he telleth also of an other Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his valliant service had bene of trewarded of the generals, with such honowhile giftes, as the ROMAINES did victo gene unto them, that had done fome famous act in any battell: and how that he havinge loft fine hotfes of feruice in the warres, the value of the Ame were reftored to him againe in money of the common treasure, bicause he had shewed himselfe trusty and valliant for the common wealth. And where they had a common speeche or ROME to call them vpftartes, that were no gentlemen borne, but did rife by vertue; it for- caso called an nined Cato to be called one of them. And for his parte, he did confesse it, that he was of the vestare. first of the house that ever had honor, and office of state : but by reason of the noble actes and good service of his auncestors, he maintained he was very auncient. He was called at the bepinning after his third name, Prifcus: but afterwardes by reason of his great wiledom and experience, he was furnamed Cara, bicause the Romaines call a wife man, and him that bath frene much, Cato. For he did not onely refuse to take fees for his pleading, and following the causes he mainteined : but furthermore made no reckening of the estimacion he wanne by that manner and practise, as though that was not the only marke he shot at. But his desire reached further rather to winne him felfe fame by feruice in the warres, and by valliant fightinge with his enemie: then with fuch a quiet and pleafing manner of life. Infomuch as when he was but a younge striplinge in maner, he had many cuttes apon his brest, which he had received in diverse battells and encounters against the enemies. But Curius returned them agains with their gold, and told them, that fuch as were contented with that supper, had no nede of gold nor filter: and that for his parte, he thought it greater honor to commaunde them that had gold, then to haue it him felfe. Cato remembring these thinges to him selfe, went homes gaine, and beganne to thinke vpon his house, of his livinge, of his family and servauntes, and also of his expences: and to cut of all superfluous charges, and fell him selfe to labor with his owne handes, more then euer he hadde done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENT VM againe, Cato ferned vnder him being very younge, where he fell Reachus the into familiar acquaintace with Nearchus the PYTHAG ORIAN philosopher, in whom he took maruelous delight to heare him talke of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that Plato did, by callinge it the sweete poyson and chiefest bayte to allure men m ill: and faying that the body was the first plague vnto the soule, and that her onely health, remedy, and purgation stoode apon rules of reason, good examples and contemplations, that drive finful thoughts and carnall pleasures of the body farre of from her. Cato moreover gave and moralls, his adages & quicke answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now

who was of a good and honorable disposition to helpe forwarde, and to aduaunce such. His name was Valerius Flaceus, a neere neighboure vnto Cato, who was informed by his feruauns of Catoes straunge life, how he would be doing in his ground with his owne hands; and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to litle villages thereabout, to pleademens causes that prayed his counsaill, & that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in winter, that he would but cast a litle coate on his shoulders, and being sommer he would go out bare, naked to the wast, to worke in his ground among his seruaunts and other workemen: & would befides, fit and eate with them together at one borde, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him also a world of such maners & facions which he vsed, that she wed to be a maruelous plaine man, without pride and of a good nature. Then they tolde him what notable wife fayinges and graue fentences they heard him speake. Valerius Flacous hearing this reporte of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiving he was of a very good nature, and wel given, & that he was a good griffe to be fet in a better ground: he perswaded him to come to Rong, and to practife there in the affembly of the people, in the common causes and affayres of the Cato goeth to common weale. For first of all, by voyce of the peo-

But to begin withal, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, about Care followed all the Senators of Rome, & gaue him felfe to follow him altogether: & not fo much for the credit & estimacion Fabius Maximus was of, (who therein exceded all the ROMAINES of that

followe, as a worthy myrror and example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and Catos small cion with Scienil will of Scipio the great, who did ftrine at that present being but a young man, with the authoritie and greatnesse of Fabius Maximus, as one that seemed to enuy his risinge and greatneffe. For Cato being fent treasorer with Scipio, when he vndertooke the iorney into A FRIKE, and perceiuing Scipices bountifull nature and disposition to large giftes without meane to the reasons we fouldiers : he tolde him plainly one day, that he did not so much hurtthe common wealth in der Scipio Awalting their treasure, as he did great harme in chauging the auncient maner of their auncefiers; who yied their fouldiers to be contented with litle, but he taught them to spende their bis massfull finerfluous money (all necessaries prouided for) in vaine toyes and trifles, to serue their plea- expences.

fure. Scipio made him aunswere, he woulde have no treasorer shoulde controll him in that forte, nor that should looke so narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the wars, with full fayles as it were, and that he woulde (and did also determine to) make the state prinie to all his doinges, but not to the money he spent. Cato hearing this aunswer, returned with frede out of Sicile vnto Rome, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio Cato acconfesh ment infinitely, and that he tended playes, commedies, and wrefilinges, as if he had not bene Scipio of riot. fent to make warres, inuafions, and attemptes apon their enemies. Apon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to goe and fee if their informations were true; and finding them fo, that they should bring him backe againe to Rome. But Scipio shewed farre otherwise to the commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparaunt victorie, through the necessary preparacion and prouision he had made for the warres; and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great businesse, and was at any leasure, he would be privately mery with his frends: and though he was liberall to his fouldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duety and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke thippinge, and fayled towards A FRIKE, whether he was fent to make warre. Now to returne to Cate. He daily increased still in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, so that dinerfe called him the Demosthenes of ROME: howbeit the maner of his life was in more estima- causes elocion, then his eloquence. For all the youth of Rome did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and quence, his continent life, Bicause the state was waxen now of such power & wealth, as it could no more retaine the auncient discipline, and former austeritie and straitnes of life it ysed: but by reason of the largenes of their dominion and seigniory, and the numbers of people and nations that were become their subjects, it was even forced to receive a medley of fundry contry facions, examples, and maners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they fawe other straight wearyed with paines and labor, tenderly brought vp like pulers; and Cato on the other fide neuer ouercommen, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coueted honor, nor in his age also when he E was gray headed and balde, after his Confullthip and triumphe, but like a conqueror that had gotten the maiftery, he would neuer geue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. He fayd furthermore, that being heire to one of his frends that dyed, he had a peece of tape-

it straight to be folde; and that of all his houses he had abroade in the contry, he had not one he would not keepe them when they coulde do no feruice. To conclude, he was of opinion that a manne bought any thinge deere, that was for litle purpose: yea, though he gaue buta farthing for it, he thought it to much to bestow so litle, for that which needed not. He would haue men purchase houses, that hadde more store of errable lande and pasture, then of fine ortevardes or gardeins. Some fave, he didde thus, for very miserie and couetousnesse: other thinke, and tooke it that he lived to sparingely, to move others by his example to cutte of all Superfluitie and wast. Neuerthelesse, to sell slaues in that forte, or to turne them out of dores when you have hadde the service of all their youth, and that they are growen olde, as you vse brute beastes that have served whilest they may for age: me thinkes that must needes proceede of to seucare and greedie nature, that hath no lenger regarde or consideracion of his a manitie, then whilest one is able to doe an other good. For we see, gentlenesse goeth further goth further then iustice. For nature teacheth vs to vie iustice onely vnto menne, but gentlenesse some times is shewed vnto brute beastes: and that commeth from the very fountaine and springe be vied vite of all curtefie and humanitie, which should neuer drye vp in any manne liuinge. For to fave bruse beafter. truely, to keepe cast horses spoyled in our seruice, and dogges also not onely when they are whelpes, but when they be olde . be euen tokens of loue and kindenesse. As the ATHE NIANS made by the made a lawe, when they builded their temple called Hecatompedon: that they shoulde suffer Athenians in the moyles and mulettes that did feruice in their cariages about the buildinge of the fame, to graze euerie where, without lette or trouble of any manne. And they fay, there was one of those moves thus turned at libertie, that came of her selfe to the place to labour, going before all the other draught beaftes, that drewe uppe cartes loden towardes the castell, and kept them companie, as though the feemed to encorage the rest to drawe: which the people liked so well in the poore beast, that they appointed she shoulde be kept whilest shellued, at the charge of the towne. And yet at this present are the graues of Cimons mares to be seene, that wanne him thrise together the game of the horse race at the games Olympian, and they are harde by the graue of Cimon him felfe. We heare of diuerfe also that hadde buried their dogges they brought vppe in their house, or that wayted on them: as amongeother olde Xanthippus buried his dogge on the toppe of a cliffe, which is called the dogges pit till this day. For when the people of ATHENS did forfake their citie at the comminge downe of Xerxes the kinge, this dogge followed his mafter, fwimminge in the fea by his gallies fide, I from the firme lande, vnto the lle of SALAMINA. And there is no reason, to vse liuinge and fencible thinges, as we woulde vie an olde shooe or a ragge: to cast it out apon the dongehill when we have worne it, and can ferue vs no longer. For if it were for no respectels, but to vse vs alwayes to humanitie: we must euer showe our selues kinde and gentle, euen in such finall poyntes of pitie. And as for me, I coulde neuer finde in my hart to fell my drawght Oxe that hadde plowed my lande a longe time, bicause he coulde plowe no longer for age: and much leffe my flaue to fell him for a little money, out of the contrie where he had dwelt along time, to plucke him from his olde trade of life wherewith he was best acquainted, and then specially, when he shalbe as unprofitable for the buyer, as also for the seller. But Cato on the other fide gloried, that he left his horse in Spayne he had served on in the warres duringe his I Confulship, bicause he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing of him home by fea into ITALIE. Now a question might be made of this, and probable reason of etther fide, whether this was noblenes, or a niggardlines in him: but otherwife to fay truely, he was a man of a wonderful abstinence. For when he was general of the army, he neuer tookeallowance but after three bushells wheat a moneth of the common wealth, for him selfe and his cases straighs whole family: and but a bushel and halfe of barley a day, to keepe his horse and other beastes for his carriage. On a time when he was Prætor, the gouernment of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot. And where the other Prætors before him hadde put the contry to exceeding great charge, to furnish them with tents, bedding, clothes, and such like stuffe, and burdened them also with a maruelous traine of servaunts and their frends that waited on them, putting them I to great expence of feafting and bancketing of them: Cato in contrary maner brought downed all that excesse and superfluitie, vnto a maruelousneere and vncredible sauinge. For when he went to visite the cities, he came a foote to them, & did not put them to a penny charge for Catoes neerehim felfe: and had onely one officer or bailife of the state, that waited on him, and caried his nesin his cirgowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine to the goddes in his facrifices. But though he came thus simply to the subjects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed him felfe feuere and bitter to them in matters concerning inflice : and spared no man, in any commaundement or service for the state and common wealth. For he was therein so precise, that 19. he woulde not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS VIIder his gouernment, both to loue and feare the Empire of Rome, more then ever they did before. For his grace both in speakinge and wrytinge did rightly shewe him selfe: bicause it was causes speech pleasaunt, and yet graue: sweete and fearfull: mery and seucare: sententious, and yet famili- and writing. R at : fuch as is meete to be spoken. And he was to be compared, as Plato sayed, vnto Socrates: The praise of who at the first fight seemed a plaine simple manne to them that knew him not outwardly, or Socrates. elfe a pleafant tawnter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him throughly, they fawe he was full of graue fentences, goodly examples, and wife perfwafions, that he coulde make men water their plantes that hearde him, and leade them as he would by the eare. Therefore I can not fee any reason that moues men to saye, Cato hadde Lysias grace and vitteraunce. Notwithstandinge, lette vs referre it to their judgementes that make profession to differne orators graces and flyles: for my parte I shall content my selfe to write at this prefent, onely certaine of his notable fayinges and fentences, perfivadinge my felfe that mennes manners are better discerned by their wordes, then by their lookes, and so doe many thinke. COn a time he feeking to diffwade the people of Rome, which woulde needes make a thankefull distribution of corne vnto euerie citizen, to no purpose: beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a harde thinge (my Lordes of Rome) to bringe the bellie by perswa- casoes farfion to reason, that hath no eares. And an other time, reprouinge the ill government of the ingen citie of ROME, he fayed: it was a hard thinge to keepe uppe that state, where a little fishe was folde dearer then an Oxe. He fayed also that the ROMAINES were like a flocke of sheepe. For faveth he, as every weather when he is alone, doth not obey the sheepeheard, but when they are all together they one followe an other for love of the foremest: even so are you, for when you are together, you are all contented to be ledde by the nofes by fuch, whose counsell not a man alone of you woulde vie in any private cause of your owne. And talkinge an other time D of the authoritie the women of Rome had ouer their husbandes. He faved: other men commaunde their wives, and we commaunde men, and our wives commaund vs. But this last of all, he borowed of Themistocles pleasaunt sayings. For his sonne making him do many things Themistocles by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day. The ATHENIAN'S commaund al GREECE. Joing. Icommaunde the ATHENIANS, you commaunde me, and your fonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vie the libertie he hath with some better discretion, foole and affe as he is, fithence he can doe more by that power and authority, then all the Greecians besides. He fayed also that the people of Rome did not onely delight in diverse fortes of purple, but likewife in diverse forces of exercises. For sayd he, as diverse commonly dye that cullour they see best esteemed, and is most pleasaunt to the eye: euen so the lusty youthes of Rome doe frame E them selves to such exercise, as they see your selves most like, and best esteme. He continually aduised the Romaines, that if their power & greatnes came by their vertue and temperance, their are. they should take hede they became no chaungelings, nor waxe worse: & if they came to that greatnes by vice and violence, that then they should chaunge to better, for by that meanes he knew very wel they had attained to great honor & dignity. Again he told the that fuch as fued ambitioufly to be are office in the common wealth, & were common futers for them: did feme to be afraid to lose their way, & therfore would be fure to have vihers & fergeants before the. to show them the way, least they should lose themselves in the city. He did reprove them also that often chose one man, to continew one office still: for it seemeth, faith he, either that you passe not much for your officers, or that you have not many choiseme you thinke worthy for officers of perp the office. There was an enemy of his that ledde a maruelous wicked and an abominable life, penning.

he did suspect all this feastinge and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar frendes tolde him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes companie, that is fo

Some would have had them reftoiudged shai red to their contrie and goodes againe: other were wholly against it. So Cato risinge vp at the the feate of reason was last, saved vnto them. He fayd alfo, that wife men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wife men. For wife men fayd he, do fee the faults fooles commit, and can wifely auoide them: but fooles neuer study to follow the example of wife mens doings. He sayedalto that he euer liked young men better that blushed, then those that looked euer whitely; and that he woulde not have him for a fouldier, that wagges his hande as he goeth, removes his feete when he fighteth, and rowteth and fnorteth lowder in his fleepe, then when he crieth out to his enemy. An other time when he woulde taunt a maruelous fatte man: fee, fayed he, what good can fuch a body do to the common wealth, that from his chinne to his coddepece is nothing but belly? And to an other man that was genen to pleasure, and defired to be great B with him: my frende, fayed Cato, as refusinge his acquaintance: I can not line with him that hath better judgement in the pallate of his mouth, then in his hart. This was also his favinge; that the foule of a louer, lived in an others body: and that in all his lifetime he repented him of three thinges. The first was, if that he euer tolde secret to any woman: the seconde, thateuer he went by water, when he might have gone by lande : the thirde, that he had bene Idles whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious olde man, he would say, to reproue him. O gray bearde, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not besides with your vice. And to a feditious Tribune of the people that was suspected to be a poysoner, and would needes passe some wicked law by voyce of the people, he woulde say: o young man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drinke the drugges thou genest, or to receive the lawes thou offerest. An other time, being reuiled by one that ledde a lewde, and naughty life go thy way, fayd he, I am no man to scolde with thee. For thou art so vsed to reuile, and to be

A reuiled, that it is not daynty to thee : But for my felfe, I never vie to heare scolding and much befiedelite to scolde. These be his wife sayinges we finde written of him, whereby we may the easilier coniecture his maners and nature. Now, when he was chosen Consull with his frend Cato, and Va-Valerius Flaceus, the gouernment of Spayne fell to his lott, that is on this fide of the river of Comful. RETIS, So, Cato havinge subdued many people by force of armes, and wonne others also by Catoes doings frendly meanes: fodainly there came a maruelous great army of the barbarous people against in spane. him. & had enuironned him fo, as he was in maruelous daunger, either shamefully to be taken prisonner, or to be flaine in the fielde. Wherefore, he sent presently vnto the CELTIBERT-ANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours vnto the marches where he was. Thefe CALTIBERIANS did aske him two hundred talentes to come & help him : but the ROMAINES that were about him, coulde not abide to hyer the barbarous people to defende them. Then Cato tolde them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonor vnto them. For saved he, if the fielde be ours, then we shall pay their wages we promised, with the spoyle and money of our enemies: and if we loofe it, then our felues and they lye by it, beinge left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the ende he wanne the battel, after a fore conflict, and after that time he hadde maruelous good fortune. For Polybius wryteth, that all the walles of the cities that were on this fide the river of B & TIS, were by his commaundement rased all in one day. which were many, and full of good fouldiers. Him felfe wryteth, that he tooke moe cities in Spayne, then he remained there dayes: and it is no vaine boaft, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of the Now, though the fouldiers under him had gotten well in this iorney, and were riche, yet he caused a pounde weight of filuer to be geuen to enery fouldier besides: sayinge, he liked it better that many should returne home with filuer in their purses, then a few of them with golde only. But for him selfe, he affirmed: that of all the Catoes abstispoyle gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thinge, saninge that which he tooke in meate spoyle and spoyle and and drinke. And yet, fayth he, I speake it not to reproue them that grow riche by such spoiles: bribery. but bicause I would contende in vertue rather with the best, then in money with the richest, or in couctoufnes with the most vertuous. For, not only he him selfe was cleare from bribes and extorcion, but his officers also under him kept the same course. In this Spanish iorney, he had fine of his fernauntes with him, whereof one of them called Panie, bought three younge boyes that were taken in the warres, when the spoile was solde to them that would gene most. So Cato knew it. But Pause being afrayed to come neere his maifter, hong him felfe: and then Cato folde the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treafory cheftes of fauing at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAYNE, Scipio the great that was his enemy, & fought to hinder the course of his prosperitie, and to have the honor of conqueringe all the rest of Discarde be-SPAYNE: he made all the frendes he could to the people, to be chosen in Catoes place. He was Scipio. no sooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible spede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authority ceasife the sooner. Cato hearing of his halty comminge, tooke only five enfignes of footemen, and five hundred horfemen to attende youn him home: with the which, in his iorney homeward, he ouercame a people in Spayne called the LACETANI- Cato ouercame ANS, and tooke fixe hundred traytors also that were fled from the ROMAINES campeto their the Laceanienemies, and did put to death euery mothers childe of them. Scipio storming at that, fayd Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, fayed: it was the right way to bringe ROMB toflorish, when noble borne citizens would not suffer meane borne men, and vostarts as him felfe was, to go before them in honor: and on the other fide when meane borne men woulde contende in vertue, with those that were of noblest race, and farre about them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to ROME, the Senate commaunded that nothing (houlde be chaunged nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilest he was in his office. So that the gouernment for which Scipio made fuch earnest fute in SPAYNE, was a greater diffrace vote him, then it was vnto Cato: bicause he passed al his time & office in peace, having no occasion offered him to doe any notable feruice worthy memory. Furthermore, Cato after he had bene-Conful, and hadde graunted to him the honor to triumphe: did not as many others doe, that feeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honor and dignity. to triumphe: do then leaue to deale any more in matters of state, & dispose them selues to line 1 merely and quietely at home, and not to trouble them felues any more. Now Cato, farre other after his Con, wife behaued him felfe. For he would neuer leaue to exercise vertue, but beganne a freshe a if he had bene but a young nouesse in the world, and as one greedy of honor and reputation and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his frends or any ther citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their causes for them that required his counsell, and go with his frendes also into the warres. As he went with Tiberius Sen. pronise the Conful, and was one of his Lieutenants at the conquest of the contry of THRACE and vnto the prouinces adiovning to the river of DANVBYE apon those marches. After that he was in GREECE also, Collonell of a thowsande footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, against king Antiochus furnamed the great, who made the Romaines as much afrayed of him, ase, uer they were of enemy but Hanniball. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of A sin, which Seleucus Nicanor enjoyed before, & had fubdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was fo proude harted, as he would nedes have wars with the Romainer whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest show and pretence of warres, saving: it was to set the GREECIANS at liberty, who had no cause thereof, considering they lived after their owne lawes, and were but lately delivered from the bondage of kinge Philip, and of the MACED ON IANS, through the goodnesse of the ROMAINES. Notwithstandinge, he came out of ASIA into GREECE with a maruelous great army, and all GREECE was straight in armes and in wonderfull daunger, bicause of the great promises and large hopes the gouernours of diverse cities (whome the kinge had wonne and (corrupted with money) did make vnto them. Whereupon Manus dispatched Ambassadors vnto the cities, and fent Titus Quintius Flaminius amonge others, who kept the greatest parte of the people from rebellinge (that were eafily drawen to geue eareto this innouation) as we have expressed more amply in his life; and Cato beinge sent Ambassador also, perswaded the CORINTHIANS, those of PATRAS, and the ÆGIANS, and made them sticke still to the Ro-MAINES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some fay they finde an oration of his wrytten in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendacion of their auncesters: wherein he sayd he tooke great pleasure to see ATHENS for the beauty and statelinesse of the city. But this is false. For he spake vnto the Athenians by an interpreter, though he coulde have vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had bene disposed: but I he did like the lawes and customes of his owne contrie, and the Romaine tongue so well. that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he didonce mocke Posthumius Albinus, who wrote an history in the Greeke tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they founde any imperfection in the tongue: mary, fayd Coto, he had deferued pardon in deede, if he hadde bene forced to have wrytten his flory in the writing a flory Greeke tonge, by order of the states of GREECE, called the counsel of the Amphicayos. They in the Greeke fay the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his redy tongue. For what he had vttered quickely in few words vnto the interpreter: the interpreter was driven to deliver them againe with great circustances, & many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GREECIANS words

Albinus aRomaine, for

fides the naturall strength & fortification of the mount it selfe in fundry places : and so hedetermined to remaine there, trusting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesayed, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The Romaines also, they dispayred viterly Catoes doings they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembringe with him selfe the compasse the PERSIANS hadde fetched about before time likewise to enter into GREECE: he departed one night from the campe with parte of the army: to proue if he could finde thever ry compasse about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed up the mount taine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken in the contrie, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruelous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore a fouldiers were in maruelous ill taking. Cate feeing the daunger they were brought into by this lewde guide, commaunded all his fouldiers not to sturre a foote from thence, and to tary him there; and in the meane time he went him felfealone, and Lucius Manlius with him (a luftie man, and nimble to cli be apon the rockes) and fo went forwarde at aduenture, takinge exreame and vncredible paine, & in as much daunger of his life; grubbing all night in the darke without moone light, through wilde Olyue trees, and high rockes (that let them they coulde not fee before them, neither could tell whether they went) vntill they stumbled at the length yppon a litle pathe way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they fet vppe certeine markes and tokens, vppon the highest toppes of the rockes they coulde choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest of y-

B pon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe Mount calliagaine to fetche the fouldiers, whom they led towardes their markes they had fet vp : vntill at dromus the length they found their pathe wave againe, where they putte their fouldiers in order to marche. Now they went not farre in this pathe they founde, but the way failed them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater feare, not knowinge they were so neere their enemies, as in deede they were. The day began to breake a litle, and one of them that marched formest, thought he hearde a noyse, and that he faw the GREEKES campe at the foote of the rockes, and certeine fouldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made them stay, & willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him. and none but them, bicause he had founde them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commaundement. They were with him at a trife to know his pleafure : fo Cato faid vnto them. Causes gration My fellowes, I must have some of our enemies taken prisoners, that I may know of them who to his some they be that keepe that paffage, what number they be, what order they keepe, howe they are camped and armed, and after what forte they determine to fight with vs. The wave to worke this feate, standeth apon swiftnes, and hardines to runne apon them sodainely, as Lyons doe, which beinge naked feare not to runne into the middeft of any hearde of fearfull beaftes. He had no fooner spoken these wordes, but the FIRMANIAN souldiers beganne to runne downe The boldenes the mountaine, as they were, apon those that kept the watch: and so setting apon them, they and vallians beinge out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they straight brought him vnto Cato, who by othe of the prisoner was aduertised, howe that Cato adverti-D the strength of their enemies armie was lodged about the persone of the kinge, within the sed of the fraight and valley of the faid mountaine: and that the fouldiers they faw, were fixe hundred fright of king ETOLIANS, all braue fouldiers, whome they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe campe. of the rockes ouer king Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making small accompt of the matter, as well for their finall number, as also for the ill order they kept : he made the trompets founde straight, and his fouldiers to marche in battell with great cries, him felfe being the formest man of all his troupe, with a sworde drawen in his hand. But when the Æro-LIANS faw them comming downe the rockes towardes them, they beganne to flie for life vn- Cata tooke the

to their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all diforder. Now Manlins Praight of at the same present also, gave an assault vnto the walles and fortifications the king had made. ouerthwart the vallies and straightes of the mountaines : at which affault, king Antiochus selfe Kinge Antiohad a blow on the face with a stone, that strake some of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for chus have in very paine & anguish he felt, he turned his horse backe, and got him behinde the prease, And the face with then there were none of his armie that made any more reliftaunce, or that coulde abide the fiercenesse of the ROMAINES. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, bicause it was unpossible for them to scatter and straggle, beinge holden in with high rockes on the one fide of them, and with bogges and deepe mariffes on the other fide, which they must needes fall into if their feete flipped, or were thrust forwarde by any : yet they fell one apon an other in the straightes, and ranne so in heapes together, that they cast themselves away, for feare of the ROMAINES fwordes that lighted uppon them in every corner. And there Mar- Cates vitto. F tw Cato, that neuer made ceremony or nifenes to praise him selfe openly, nor reckened it any ry of kinge wrote with his owne handes, that fuch as faw him chase and lay vpon his flying enemies the day, were driven to fay, that Cato was not bound to the Romaines, but the Romaines bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Confull felfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the bar. tell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hotte with chasinge of the enemy : and fpake alowde with great joy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of Rome could recom-Dence Cato for his valliant service that day. After this battell, the Consul Manine sent Catom Manius for Rome, to be the messenger him selfe to reporte the newes of the victory. So he imbarked in continently, and had fuch a fayer winde, that he passed ouer the sea to BRINDES without any never of the daunger, and went from thence vnto TARENT VM in one day, and from TARENT VM in four dayes more to Rome. And so he came to Rome in fine dayes after his landing in Italie, and made fuch speede, that him selfe was in deede the first messenger that brought newes of the p

That to accuse and pursue the wicked Caso an accu- he thought it was the best thinge an honest man and good governour of the common wealth coulde employ him felfevnto: for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be shorte, he did alwayes stirre vp some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio, But Scipio, by reason of his nobility, the greatnes of his house, and the magnanimity of his minde, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being our of all feare, they should be able to condemne him. And so he let fall the accusation he had a c gainst him. Notwithstanding, he joyned with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne brother, and followed the matter fo fore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in great fumme of money to the comon wealth; who being viable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people renoked his condemnation, It is fayd that Cato comming through the market place one day, and meeting with a younge manne by the way that had ouerthrowen his adversary in fute, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame and soyle before the people: he imbraced him with a good countenaunce and fayd vnto him. Oh my fonne, facrifices that good children should offerw their fathers foule, be not lammes nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free him selfe from daunger, in administration of I the comon wealth. For if they could katch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him : so as they say he was accused almost a fifty times, and at the last timeof his accusation, he was about the age of source score yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: that it was a harder thinge to geue vp an accompt of his life before men in a ny other world, then in this among whom he lived. And yet was not this the last sute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was foure score and tenne yeares of age, he accused Seruius Galba. And thus he lived as Neftor, in maner three ages of man, alwayes in continual fute and action. For when he wreftled with the first Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of state and common wealth: he went on vnto the time of the seconde, that was adopted by the first Scipioes sonne, the natural sonne of Paulus AEmylius, who ouercame Perseus, king of Mace-E DON. Furthermore, Marcus Cato, tenne yeares after his Confulfhip, fued to be Cenfor, which Was in ROME the greatest office of dignity that any citizen of ROME could attain evento: and as a man may fay, the roome of all glory and honor of their common wealth. For among other authorities the Cenfor had power to examine mens lives & maners, and to punish every of fendor, For the ROMAINES were of that minde, that they woulde not have men mary, gette children, liue privately by them felues, and make feaftes and banckettes at their pleafure, but that they should stande in searce to be reproued and inquiered of by the magistrate: and that it was not good to geue every body liberty, to doe what they would, following his owne lust and fansie. And they judging that mens naturall dispositions do appeare more in such things, then in all other thinges that are openly done at none dayes, and in the fight of the worlde: vied to choose two Censors, that were two Surveyors of maners, to see that every man behaved him felfe vertuoufly, and gaue not them felues to pleafure, nor to breake the lawes and customes

A of the common wealth. These officers were called in their tongue, Cenfores, and alwayes of How the Cencultome one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a commoner. These two had power for were choand authority to difgrade a knight by taking away his horse, & to put any of the Senate, whom fem. they faw line dissolutely and disorderly. It was their office also, to ceasife and rate enery citizen accordinge to the estimacion of their goodes, to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man, and to kepe bookes of them, besides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therefore when Cato came to fue for this office among other, the chiefest Senators were all bent against him. Some of them for very enuy, thinkinge it shame and disho- The Senere's

Other also that were ill livers, & knowing (iii) that they had offended the lawes of their contry: they feared his cruelty to much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, having the law in his owne hands. So when they had consulted together about it, they did set up seuen competitors against him, who flattered the people with many fayer wordes and promises, as though they had neede of magifirstes to vie them gently, and to doe thinges for to please them. But Cato contrariwise, shewinge no countenaunce that he would vie them gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning those that had lived naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they must reforme their citie, and perswaded the people not to choose the gentlest, but the sharpeft phisitions: and that him felfe was such a one as they needed, & among the PATRICIANS C Valerius Flaceus an other, in whose company he hoped (they two beinge chosen Censors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burninge and cutting of (like Hydras heades) all vanity and voluptuous pleasures, that were crept in amongest them: and that he sawe well enough, how all the other futers fought the office by dishonest meanes, fearing such officers as they knew would deale justly & vprightly. Then did the people of Rome shew them selues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refused not the sowernesse or seuerity of Cato, but rejected these meals mouthed men, that seemed ready to please the peoplein all thinges: and thereupon chose Marcus Cato Censor, and Valerius Flacous to be his care shoten

Moreouer he ordained for every thousand Asses that those trifling things were praised at, the owners of them should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasory: to the ende that they who were greened with this taxe, and fawer ther pay leffe fubfidy (that were as much worth as them felues, by living without fuch tores) might call home them felues againe, and lay a fide fuch foolishe brauery and finenesse. Not withstandinge, Cato was enuied every way. First, of them that were contented to pay the mat h imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanity: and next, of them also, that would rather reforme them selues, then pay the taxe. And some thinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goodes, then to let them to make shew of them; and they have a fonde opinion besides, that their riches is better seene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Whereat they fay Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and fuperfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar frends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, & to make him graunt it the fooner, told him it was a thinge he might well spare, and did him no good: mary fayeth he, all the goods I have, are in such toyes as do me no good. So this conetous desire we have to be rich, comtoyes, that did meth of no necessary desire in nature, but is bred in vs by a false opinion from the common forte. Now, Cato caringe leaft of all for the exclamations they made against him, grewe to be more straight and seuere. For he cut of the pipes and quilles private men had made to convey water into their houses & gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their comon conduite heades, and did plucke downe also mens porches that were made before their dors into the strete, & brought downe the prises of comon workes in the city, and moreouer raised the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could: all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of most men. Wherefore, Titus Flaminius, and certaine other beinge bent against him in open Senate, caused all Catoes couenauntes and bargaines made, with the mafter worke man for repayring & mending of the common buildings & holy places, to be made voide, as things greatly prejudiciall to the common wealth. And they did also stirre up the boldest and rashest of the Tribunes of the people against him, bicause they thould accuse him vnto the people, and make request he might be condemned in the summe of two talentes. They did marueloufly hinder also the buildinge of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate house: which nallace was finished not with standing, & called after his name, Basilica Porcia: as who would Basilica Por-Tay the pallace Porcius the Cenfor built. Thadrather men should aske why Cato had no Image set up for him, then why he had anv. In the ende, he would have no honest man abide to be praised, onles his praise turned to the be-

And fuch as far the comcounterfeated to follow any of his doinges, and came shorte of his maner, he called them left mon wealth handed Catoes. He would say, that in most daungerous times the Senate vsed to cast their eyes voon him, as passengers on the sea do looke voon the master of the shippe in a storme: & that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come amonge them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other, as by him felfe. His authority was great in matters of state, for his wisedome, his eloquence, and great experience. Besides this commendacion, they praised him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, & a good fauer for his profit: for he was neuer careles of them, as things vehacase to be lightly passed on. And therfore me thinkes I must nedes tell you by the way, some parte was at home to be lightly paned on. He sayed moreover, that he wrote goodly histories in great letters with he i owne hande, bicause his sonne might learne in his fathers house the vertues of good menh times past, that he taking example by their doinges, should frame his life to excell them. He faved alfo. that he tooke as great heede of speaking any fowle or vncomely wordes before his fonne, as he would hauedone if he had bene before the Vestall Nunnes. He would ever craftily make one of them fall out with an other: for he could not abide they should be frendes, beinge euer icalous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserved death, he would declare his offence beforethem all: and Cattoes good then if they condemned him to dye, he would put him to death before them all. Then he would venter among them for a parte onely, by sea whereof Quintius his slaue whom he had manumised, was made his factor, and vied to savle, and traffiked with the marchaunts, to whom he had lent his money out to viery. And thus he did not yenter all the money he lent, but a litle peece only for his parte, and gotte maruelous B riches by his viery. Moreouer he lent money to any of his flaues, that would therwith buy other young flaues, whom they taught and brought vp to do feruice, at Catoes charge and coft; and then they folde them againe at the yeares ende, and some of them Cato kept for his owne fernice, and gaue his slaues as much for them, as any other offered. Yet this was a token of a most greedy couctous minde, that he durst affirme him to be dinine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimony more, then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato Was growen very olde, Carneades the Academicke, and Diogenes the Stoicke, were fent Carneades, etc. from ATHENS as Ambassadors to Rome, to sue for a release of a fyne of fine hundred talentes Diogenes C which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS apon a condemnation passed against them, for Philosophers Immediatly when these two Philosophers were arrived in the citie of Rome, the younge Rome. gentlemen that were geuen to their bookes, did visite and welcome them, and gaue greatreperence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: whose grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse, then the same ranne vppon him, and specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not suppresse his praise. Rome straight was full, as if a winde had blowen this rumor into enery mans eare: that there was a GREECIAN arrived, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence woulde leade a man as he luft. There was no other talke a while through the whole city, he had so in-D flamed the younge gentlemens mindes with loue and defire to be learned: that all other pleafures and delightes were fet a fide, and they disposed them selves to no other exercise, butto the fludy of Philosophy, as if some secrete and divine inspiration from aboue had procured them to it. Whereof the Lordes and Senators of Rome were glad, and rejoyced much to fee their youth fo well geuen to knowledge, and to the fludy of the Greeke tongue, and to delite in the company of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from caso milliked the beginning that young men beganne to study the Greeke tongue, and that it grewe in estimacion in Rome, did diflike of it: fearing least the youth of Rome that were defirous of learninge and cloquence, woulde vtterly give over the honor and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he fawe the estimacion and fame of these two personages did increase more and more. E and in such forte that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefest of the Senate, made sute to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the citie by fome honest meane and culour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambaffadors were long there. and had no dispatche : considering also they were cunninge men, and coulde easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might perswade them to determine some aunswere for them, and so to fend them home againe to their schooles, to teach their children of GREECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any private ill willor malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought: but bicause he generally hated Philosophy, and of an ambition despised the muses, & knowledge of the Greeke

F tongue. Which was the more suspected, bicause he had sayd, the auncient Socrates was but a busie man, and a sturrer vp of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to vsurpetyranny, and tule in his contrie: by peruerting and chaunging the manners and customes of the fame, and

388 MARCUS CATO. alluringe the subjectes thereof to a dislikinge of their lawes and auncient customes. Andle A laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the arte of eloquence: saying, his schollers waxed old and were still so long alearning, that they ment to vse their eloquence and pleade causes in a other worlde, before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore, to plucke his sonne from the study of the Greeke tongue, he sayd to him with a strayned voyce, and in a bigger found then he was wont to doe: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecy or inspiration) that he longe as the ROMAINES disposed them selves to study the Greeke tongue, so longe would they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proued his vaine wordes falle and vn. true. For the citie of Rome did neuer florishe so much, nor the Romaine Empire was ener so great, as at that time, when learninge and the Greeke tongue most florished. However Cato did not onely hate the Philosophers of GREECE, but did dillike them also, that professed phisicke in Rome. For he had either hearde or red the aunswere Hippocrates made, when the king of PERSIA fent for him, and offered him a great fumme of golde and filuer, if he would come and ferue him: who sware he would neuer serue the barbarous people, that were name rall enemies to the GREECIANS. So Cato affirmed, it was an othe that all other philitions sware euer after : wherefore he commaunded his fonne to flie from them all alike, and faved he hadde wrytten a litle booke of phisicke, with the which he did heale those of his house when they were ficke, and did keepe them in health when they were whole. He neuer forbad them to eate, but did alwayes bringe them vppe with erbes, and certaine light meates, as mallard ringedoues, and hares: for fuch meates, fayd he, are good for the ficke, and light of difgeftion fauing that they make them dreame and morte that eate them. He boafted also how with this (maner of phisicke, he did alwayes keepe him felfe in health, and his family from fickenes, Ye for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of : for he buried both his wife, and his sonne also. But he him selfe was of a stronge nature, and a lusty body, full of strength, and health, and lived long without sickenesse: so that when he was a very olde man and pastingriage, he loued women well, and maried a younge maiden for that cause onely. After his fift wife was dead, he maried his sonne vnto Paulus AEmylius daughter, the fifter of Scipio, these conde A FRICAN. Cato him selse beinge a widower, tooke paines with a prety younge maile that waited in his house, and came by stellth to his chamber: howebeit this haunt couldence long continue fecret in his house, and specially where there was a younge gentlewoman maried, but needes must be spied. So, one day when this young maide went somewhat boldly bil the chamber of young Cato, to go into his father, the young man fayd neuer a word at it:yet his father perceiued that he was somewhat ashamed, and gaue the maide no good countenaunce. Wherefore findinge that his fonne and daughter in lawe were angry with thematter, fayinge nothinge to them of it, nor shewinge them any ill countenaunce: he wentone morninge to the market place (as his maner was) with a traine that followed him, amongelt whome was one Salonius, that had bene his clearke, and wayted vpon him as the rest did, Coto calling him out alowde by his name, asked him if he hadde not yet bestowed his daughter. Salonius aunswered him, he had not yet bestowed her, nor woulde not, before he made him privie to it. Then Cato tolde him againe: I have founde out a husbande for her, and a found

Then Cato beganne to discouer, and tolde him plainely he would willingely mary her him felfe. Salonius therewith was abathed, bicause he thought Cato was too olde to mary then, and him selfe was no fitte manne to matche in any honorable house, speciallie with a Confull and one that haddetiiumphed: howebeit in the ende, when he fawe Cato ment good earnest, he was very glad of the matche, and so with this talke they went on together to the markette place, and agreed then vpon the mariage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the fonne taking F fome of his kinne and frendes with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thinge, that for spight he shoulde bringe him a steppe mother into his house.

Ow that we have fette downe in wrytinge, these notable and worthie Aristides and things of memory: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life Catoer acceffe of the other, perhappes the difference between the one and the other wealth. will not eafily be differned, feeinge there be fo many fimilitudes and resemblances one of an other. But if we come to compare them in euery particularity, as we would doe Poets workes, or pictures drawen in tables: first, in this we shall finde them much a like, that having had nothing else to preferre and commende them, but their onely vertue & wildom, they have bene both governors in their common wealth, and have thereby atchieued to great honor and estimacion. But me thinkes when Aristides B came to deale in matters of state, the common wealth and seigniory of ATHENS was then of nogreat power, and therefore it was easie for him to set him selse in prease. Besides, the other gouernors and captaines that were of his time, & competitors with him, were not very rich. nor of great authority. For the taxe of the richest persones then at ATHENS in revenue, was but at fine hundred bushells of corne, and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni, The second taxe was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushells, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marem Cato comminge out of a litle village, from a rude contry life, went at the first dashe (as it were)to plunge him selfe into a bottomles sea of gouernment in the comon wealth of Rome: which was not ruled then by fuch gouernors and captaines, as Curius, Fabricius, and Oltilius C were in old time. For the people of ROME did no more bestow their offices upon such meane laboring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they woulde looke now apon the nobility of their houses, and vpon their riches, that gaue them most money, or fued earnestly to them for the offices. And by reason of their great power and authority, they woulde be waited vpon, and fued vnto, by those that sought to beare the honorable offices of the state and common wealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to haue Themistocles an aduer fary and competitor, being neither of noble house, nor greatly rich (for they say, that all the goodes his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fine hundred talentes, when he beganne to deale in state) in respect as to contende for the chiefest place of honor and authority against Scipio African, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, hauing no other main-E tenance, nor helpe to trust vnto, but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnes. Moreover, Aristides at the battells of MARATHON, and of PLATES, was but one of the tenne captaines of the ATHENIANS: where Cate was chosen one of the two Consuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Cenfors, before seuen other that made

from Rome. But yet this is more straunge which they reporte of him besides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was ever the one ende of his tale: me thinketh still CARTHAGE would be vtterly destroyed. Publius Scipio Nasica, vsed ener in like manner the contrary speech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE should stand. This against Cato, froying of

Scipio Rafica, Publius Scipio faw, in my opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and infolency were full of abfurdities, and carried them felues very high, by reason of their happy successed and victories, and were io lofty minded, that the Senate could hardly rule, them: and that by reason of their great authoritie, they imagined they might bringe their citie to what height they would. Therefore he spake it, that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwayes continue as about dle, to raigne in the infolency of the people of Rome, who knew well enough, that the Case

THAGINIANS Were of no sufficient power to make warres with the Romaines, nor yet too. uercome them: and even so were they not wholly to be despised, and not to be feared at all Cato still replied to the contrary, that therein consisted the greatest daunger of all: that a cine which was ever of great force and power, and had bene punished by former warres and milery, would alwayes have an eye of revenge to their enemies, and be much like a horse that had broken his halter, that being vnbridled, would runne vpon his rider. And therfore he thought it not good, nor founde aduise, so to suffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their strength but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward daunger, and the feare they floods D in to loofe their conquest: and specially, when they left meanes within the city selfe to fall fill againe to their former rebellion. And this is the cause why they suppose Cato was the occasion, of the thirde and last warre the ROMAINES had against the CARTHAGINIANS, But now when the warre was begonne, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would fay, who it should be that should ende those warres. And it was Scipio the second, who being a young man at that time, had charge only as a Colonell ouer a thousand footemen: but in all battells, and wherefoeuer there was warres, he shewed him selfe euer valliant and wife. Infomuch as newes being brought thereof continually vnto Rome, and Cato hearinge them, spake as they fay, these two verses of Homer:

> This only man right vvise, reputed is to be, all other seeme but shadovves set, by such vvise men as he.

Which prophecy, Scipio soone after confirmed true by his doinges. Moreouer, the issue Cato left behinde him, was a fonne he had by his feconde wife: who was called (as we fayd before) Cato SALONIAN, by reason of his mother, and a litle boy of his eldest some that diedbefore him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a fonne behinde him that came to be Confull, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philosopher, one of the most vertuous men of his time.

fore them all. Furthermore, Ariftides was never the chiefest in any victory. For at the battel A of MARATHON, Miltiades was the generalliand at the battell of SALAMINA, Themiftocles and at the iorney of PLAT EES, king Paulanias as Herodotus fayeth, who wryteth that he had a maruelous victory there. And there were that striued with Aristides for the second place as Sophanes. Amynias. Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable vallianties. uice at those battells. Now Cato was generall him selfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthings and counfell, during the warre he made in SPAYNE, while he was Confull. Afterwards also in

ing but a Colonell of a thousande footemen, and seruinge under an other that was Conful wanne the honor of the victory, when he did fodainely fet vpon Antiochus behinde, whereas he looked only to defend him selfe before. And that victory, without all doubt was one of the R chiefest actes that euer Cato did, who draue Asia out of GREECE, and opened the way vito Lucius Scipio to passe afterwardes into Asia. So then for the warres, neither the one nor the Aristides and Cases difpleasures in the common wealth.

other of them was euer ouercome in battell: but in peace and civill government, Arillider was supplanted by Themistocles, who by practise got him to be banished ATHENS for a time Whereas Cato had in manner all the greatest and noblest men of Rome that were in his time, fworne enemies vnto him: and having alwayes contended with them even to his last hower. he euer kept him felfe on sounde grounde, like a stoute champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foyle. For he having accused many before the people, and many also accusing him: him fells The power of was never once condemned, but alwayes his tongue was the buckeler and defence of his life impocency & and innocency. Which was to him so necessary a weapon, and with it he could help himselfe C fo in great matters, that (in my opinion) it was only cause why he neuer received dishonor, nor was vniustly condemned: rather then for any thing else he was beholding to fortune, or to2. ny other that did protect him. And truely, eloquence is a fingular gift, as Antipater witneffeth. in that he wrote of Ariftotle the Philosopher after his death: laying, that amongest many other fingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he coulde perfwade whathe lifted. Now there is a rule confessed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a city: a parte where of is Oeconomia, comonly called houserule, considering that a city is no other, then an affembly of many householdes and houses together, & then is the city commonly strong & ofpower, when as the townes men and citizens are wife and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that ba-D nished golde and silver from LACED EMON, and coyned them money of iron, that wouldebe marred with fyre & vinegre when it was hot, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not onely cut of all superfluous expences that commonly wayte vppon riches, but did also prouide that his people should lacke nothing necessary to line withall, fearing more to see a begger and new persone dwellinge in his citie, and enjoy the priviledges of the same, then a proude manby reason of his riches. So methinkes, Cato was as good a father to his householde, as he was a good gouernor to the common wealth: for he did honeftly increase his goods, and did teach other also to do the same, by fauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof, in his booke he wrote fundry good rules and precepts. Ariftides contrariwife, made inflice odious & flam. E derous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans felfe that vsed iustice. And yet Hesiodus the Poet, that commendeth iusticeso much, doth wishe vs withall to be good husbandes, reprouing sloth and idlenes, as the roote and originall of all injustice. And therefore me thinkes Homer spake wifely when he faved.

In times past neither did I labor, carcke nor care for busines, for family, for foode, nor yet for fare: but rather did delight, with shippes the feaes to faile, to drown a bown, to fling a dart in wwarres, and to premaile. As giving vs to vnderstand, that instice & husbandry are two relatives, & necessarily lincked one to the other: and that a man who hath no care of his owne thinges, nor house, doth line F The name of vniustly, and taketh from other men. For instice is not like oyle, which Phisitions fay is very holfome for mannes body, if it be applied outwardly: and in contrary maner very ill, if a man

A drinkeit: neither ought a just man to profitte straungers, and in the ende not to care for him felfe nor his. Therefore, me thinkes this gouerninge vertue of Ariftides had a fault in this re- No man wife, fnect, if it be true that most authors wryte of him: that he had no care nor forecast with him that is not to leaue fo much, as to mary his daughters with all, nor therewith to bury him felfe. Where those of the house of Cato, continued Prætors and Consulls of Rome, evenynto the fourte diffeent. For his fonnes fonnes, and yet lower, his fonnes fonnes fonnes came to the greatest offices of dignity in all Rome. And Ariftides, who was in his time the chiefest ma of Greece.

left his posterity in so great pouerty, that some were compelled to become Soothsavers (that interprete dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their living, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy of him. But to contrary this, it might B he favd, pouerty of it selfe is neither ill nor dishonest: but where it groweth by idlenes, care- nerry be an ill leffe life, vanity, and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth apon any man that is ho- thing. neft, and liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, just, valliant, wife, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great figne of a noble minde. For it is vnpoffible that man thould doe any great thinges, that had fuch a base minde, as to thinke alwayes vppon trifles: and that he should relieve the poore greatly, that lacketh him selfe reliefe in many thinges. And fure, riches is not so necessary for an honest man that will deale truely in the common wealth, and gouernment, as is fufficiency: which beinge a contentacion in it felfe, and defirous of no superfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the common wealth, that enjoyeth the fame. For God is he alone, who simply and absolutely hath no neede of any thinge at all: wherefore the chiefest vertue that can be in man, and that commeth nearest vinto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to have neede of leaft thinges. For like as a lufty body, and well complexioned, hath no neede of fuperfluous fare and curious apparell: euen so a cleane life, and sounde house, is kept with a litle charge. and so should ethe goodes also be proportioned, accordinge to vie and necessity. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no defire to spend much then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he neederh : and if he do defire it and dare not for niggardlines spende parte of that he laboreth for, then is he miserable. Now woulde I aske Cato with a goodwill, if riches be made but to vie them, why do you boast then you have gotten much together, when a litle doth fuffice you? and if it be a commendable thing (as in D troth it is) to be contented with the breade you finde, to drinke of the fame tappe workemen and laborers do, not to care for purple dyed gownes, nor for houses with plattered walles: it followeth then that neither Arillides, nor Epaminondas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabricius, haueforgotten any parte of their dueties, when they cared not for gettinge of that which they would not vse nor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man that esteemed rootes and parsenippes to be one of the best dishes in the worlde, and that did seeth them him selfe in his to wryte by what arte and industry a man might quickely enrich him selfe. For it is true, that fufficiency, and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thinge: but it is bicause it taketh from vs all defire of vnnecessary thinges, and maketh vs not to passe for them. E And therefore we finde that Ariftides fayd, when riche Callias case was pleaded, that such as were poore against their willes, might wel be ashamed of their pouerty: but such as were willingly poore, had good cause, and might justly rejoyce at it. For itwere a mad parte to thinke that Ariftides pourty proceeded of a base minde & slothfulnes, since he might quickely have made him felfe rich without any dishonesty at all, by taking only the spoyle of some one of the barbarous people whome he had ouercome, or any one of their tentes. Butenough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victories and battells Cato had wonne, they didin maner Whiter A. litle helpe to increase the Empire of Rome: for it was already so great, as it could almost be no vilide fatter greater. But Aristides victories are the greatest conquestes and noblest actes that the GREE- did mest bene-CIANS ever did in any warres : as the iorney of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, and the fit their com-chimney, whilest his wife did bake his bread, to talke so much of an Affe, and to take paines

F battell of PLATEES. And yet there is no teason to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, my. nor the walles of the citie of SPAYNE which Cato ouerthrewe and rafed, vnto fo many thoufands of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrowen and put to the fword by the GREE-

CIANS, as well by lande, as by fea. In all which feruices, Ariffides was the chiefest beforeal other, as touching his valliantnes in fighting: notwithstanding, he gaue other the glory of it that defired it more then him selfe, as he did easily also leave the gold & silver vnto those the had more neede of it then him felfe. Wherein he shewed him felfe of a nobler minde, thenall they did. Furthermore, for my parte, I will not reproue Catoes manner, to commende and extoll him selfe so highly aboue all other, since he him selfe sayth in an oration he made, that me praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himselfe: but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect, that defireth other should not praise him, then he that commonly doth vie to praise him felfe. For, not to be ambitious, is a great flew of humanity, & necessary for him that will Ambition, a liue amongest men of gouernment: and even so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth greaten. uv vnto him, that is infected withall. Of the which Ariftides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in R it. For Aristides did help Themistocles his chiefest enemie, in all his noblest actes, and did sense him(as a man would fay) like a private fouldier that garded his persone, when Themistocles was generall, beinge the onely instrument and meane of his glory: which was in deede the onely cause that the city of ATHENS was faued, and restored againe to her former good state, Cate contrariwife, croffing Scipio in all his enterprifes, thought to hinder his voyage and iorney vn to CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hanniball, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and so in the ende, continuing him still in lealouzy with the state, and euer accusinge of him, he neuer left him, till he had driven him out of the city, and caused his brother Lucius Scipio to be shamefully condemned for thest, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore for temperaunce and modesty, which Cato did euer commende so highly: Aristides truely kept (cato retroued them most fincerely. But Catoes seconde wife, who maried a maide, (that was neither fit for his for his fecond dignity and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he can not be excused with honesty, that beinge a man past mariage, brought his sonne that was maried, and his fayer daughter in lawe, a steppe mother into his house, and but a clearkes daughter, whose father did wryte for money, for any man that woulde hyer him. Take it Cato maried her to fatisfie his luft, or else for spite to be revenged of his sonne, bicause his sonne coulde not abide his younge filth he had before: either of these turneth still to his shame, as wel the effect, as also the cause. Againe, the excuse he made to his sonne why he maried, was also alve. For if he had grounded his desire in deede, to have gotten other children, as he fayd, that might be as honest men as his eldest sonne: then surely he had done well after the death of his first wife, if he had sought him an other wife soone after, that had bene of an honest house, and not to have lien with a young harlatry filth, tilhis fonne had spiedhim, and then when he faw it was knowen, to goe and mary her, and to make alliance with him. not bicause it was honorable for him to do it, but was easiest to be obtained.

THE LIFE Philopæmen.

N the city of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caf-Jander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authoritie in go-Quernmet there, as any man of his time what foeuer. Notwithstanding, fortune frowned on him in the ende, infomuch as he was driven out of his contry, and went to lye in the city of MrGAL OPOLIS, only for crants, phi 2 the loue he bare vnto Crausis, Philopamenes father, a rare man, and no topamenes bly geuen in all thinges, and one that loued him also very well. Now father. fo longe as Crausis lived, Cassander was so well vsed at his handes, that fo longe as Craujes nued, Cajjanuer was to what the worlde, Cafe Caffander he could lacke nothing: and when he was departed this worlde, Cafe Caffander he could lacke nothing and when he was departed this worlde, Cafe Caffander he could lack nothing the Canada into his charge he. fander, to requite the loue Crausis bare him in his life time, tooke his sonne into his charge, being an orphane, and taught him, as Homer fayd Achilles was brought vp by the olde Phoenix. maifter. So this childe Philopamen grewe to have noble conditions, and increased alwayes from good to better. Afterwardes, when he came to grow to mans state, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both Demophanes MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernment. They were two Philosophers that red Philosohad bene hearers of Arcesilans, in the schoole of Academia, and afterwardes employed all Physic Philothe Philosophy they had learned, apon the gouerning of the common wealth, and dealing in matters of state, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they delinered their city from the tyranny of Ariftodemus, who kept it in subjection, by corruptinge those that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus also to drive the tyran Niocles, out of Sicron's. At the request of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with civil diffention & factions among them,

C they went vnto Cyrena, where they did reforme the state of the common wealth, and state blished good lawes for them. But for them selues, they reckened the education and bringing vp of Philopamen, the chiefest acte that ever they did: Iudging that they had procured an vnil uerfall good vnto all GREECE, to bring vp a man of fo noble a nature, in the rules and precepts of Philosophy. And to say truely, GRECE did love him passingly well, as the last valliant man on Philotophy. And to lay trulely, Grace did loue him painingly well, as the interaction of the brought foorth in her age, after so many great and famous auncients. Gaptiones: and did the laft amount alwayes increase his power and authority, as his glory did also rife. VV hereuppon there mas a ma of Greece. ROMAINE, who to praise him the more, called him the last of the Great ans a meaninge, that after him, GREECE neuer brought foorth any worthy persone, descringe the name of a GREECIAN. And now concerninge his persone, he had no ill face, as many suppose he hads for his whole image is yet to be seene in the city of DELPHES, excellently well done, as if he were aliue. And for that they reporte of his hostesse in the city of MEGARA, who tooke him for a feruing man: that was by reason of his curtesie, not standing uppon his reputacion, and bicause he went plainely besides. For she vnderstanding that the Generall of the ACHALANA came to Inne there all night, she besturred her, and was very busie preparinge for his supper her husband paraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane feafon came Plan lopamen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his backe. The simple woman seeinge him no better apparelled, tooke him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and fo praved him to lende her his hande in the kitchin. Hestraight cast of his cloke, and beganne to fall to have wodde. So, as Philopamen was busic about it, in commeth her husbande, and findinge him rivinge of wodde: ha ha ha, fayd he, my Lorde Philopæmen, why what meanth a this? Truely nothing elfe, fayd he in his Dorican tongue, but that I am punished, bicaufel am neither fayer boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius fayed one day vnto him. seeminge to mocke him for his personage: O Philopamen, thou hast fayer handes, and good legges, but thou hast no belly, for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Not withstandinge, I take it this leasting etended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body: bicaufe he had both good horsemen, and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. These geastes, schollers haue taken uppe in schooles, of Philopamen. But now in discend to his nature and conditions: it seemeth that the ambition and defire he had to winne honor in his doinges, was not without fome heate and wilfullnes. For, bicause he would also gether follow Epaminondas steppes, he shewed his hardines to enterprise any thing, his wife of dome to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no money could corrupt him: but in civill matters and controversies, he coulde hardly otherwhiles keepe him selfe within the bondes of modelty, pacience, and curtefie, but woulde often burst out into choller, and wilfulnes. Wherfore it feemeth, that he was a better Captaine for warres, then a wife gouernor for peace. And in deede, even from his youth he ever loved fouldiers, and armes, and delitted marueloufly in all martiall exercises: as in handling of his weapon well, riding of hories delighted in FATE O MAT gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And bicause he seemed to have a naturall gift in wrestling. certaine of his frendes, and such as were carefull of him, did wishe him to geue him lefe most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made such profession, would no hinderaunce to their martiall exercises. Aunswere was made him againe, that the disposed li tion of the persone, and manner of life that wrestlers yied, and such as followed like exercises was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a souldier, and specially touching life and limme. For wreftlers studied altogether to keepe them selues in good plight, by much leeping, eating, and drinking, by laboring, and taking their eafe at certaine howers, by not milfinge a jotte of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to loose the force and strengthos their body, if they did furfit never fo litle, or paffed their ordinary course & rule of diet. Where fouldiers contrariwife are yied to all chaunge, and divertitie of life, and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse, and scarsity, and to watche in the night without fleepe. Philopamen hearing this, did not onely forfake those exercises, and scorned them, but afterwardes beinge Generall of an army, he fought by all infamous meanes he coulde to put I downe all wreftling, and fuch kinde of exercise, which made mennes bodies ynmeete to take paines, and to become fouldiers for to fight in defence of their contry, that otherwise would haue bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his booke and schoolemssters, and beganne to weare armor in inuations the MANTINEIANS yied to make uppor the LACED EMONIANS, to getfome spoyle on a sodaine, or to destroy a parte of their contry. Philopamen then would ever be the formost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leafure, he red much hunting in time of peace, all to acquainte his body with toyle and trauell, or else he would be digging of his groundes. For he had a favre mannor, not passinge twenty furlonges out of the city, whether he would walke commonly after dinner or supper and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lye vpon some ill fauored mattrelle, I as the meanest laborer he had, and in the morninge by breake of the day, he went out either
